CLEASBY, B. [after observing that the Court of Q. B. in the above case had held that sect. 34 of 39 & 40 Vict. c. 61, was retrospective, continued:] We are not dealing with the 34th but the 35th section, and there is some difference in the language. Without questioning the decision upon the 34th section, we are compelled to say that in construing the 35th we must give effect to the 36th. The 36th section enacts that the provisions as to settlement (including necessarily the 35th section) shall not take effect where there has been an order of removal, &c., which is as much as saying that they shall take effect and replace the old law in general, but not where the old law has been acted on. It would be giving no effect to the 36th section to hold otherwise.—p. 80.

LORD HALSBURY.—It [the above case] appears to have been decided under two misapprehensions or serious errors in the reasoning. One was in supposing that the constructive residence with the parent had anything to do with the question before the Court. It had nothing whatever to do with it. . . . Another error was in supposing that the language of the proviso can be construed in reference to the supposed policy of the enactment to prevent the separation of families. Now it is to be observed that the separation of families is undoubtedly one of the objects which the statute sought to prevent; but it apparently was not brought to the attention of the Court that that object was effected by a specific provision (viz., sect. 3).—p. 103.

CAVE, J.—In Reg. v. Maidstone Union the husband did not absent himself from the conjugal home, but turned his wife out because she had committed adultery, and refused to receive her back; and the Court held that there had been such a desertion of her by him as to bring the case within 24 & 25 Vict. c. 55, s. 3. There we are asked to go further, and to say that where the wife departs from the conjugal home of her own free will, and remains absent for six years, living a life of profligacy in the meantime, the husband is guilty of deserting his wife.—p. 530.

Rex v. Newtown (1834) 3 N. & M. 306; 1 A. & E. 238; 3 L. J. M. C. 79.—K.B.

PATTERSON, J.—I cannot distinguish this case from Rex v. Crediton, and I feel bound to decide it by that authority. I confess also that I cannot distinguish it from Rex v. Burbach, but I must take it that Rex v. Crediton overruled Rex v. Burbach. Lord Ellenborough, in Rex v. Bilborough (1 B. & A. 115), made a distinction between that case and Rex v. Burbach. . . . But I am quite unable to reconcile the two cases.—p. 311.

CROMPTON, J.—In Rex v. Bridgewater there must have been an authority to the friend to pay inferred by the Sessions, otherwise no action for money paid would lie.

CAMPBELL, C.J.—If that case is not so explained, I am of opinion that it is not law.—p. 125.

- BAYLEY, J. (for the Court).—The first case of a purchase for money by a certificated man is The King v. Stansfield, where a purchase by the pauper for 47*l.* paid by him of a leasehold estate in the certificated township, was held to gain him a settlement. It is material to look at the language used by the Court in their judgment. [His lordship then quoted part of the judgment of Lee, L.C.J., p. 692, and after referring to the subsequent cases of Rex v. Deddington (Burr. S. C. 220); Rex v. Cold Ashton (Burr. S. C. 444); Rex v. Long Wittingham (2 Bott 531, Mich. Term, 24 Geo. 3); and Rex v. Warblington (1 T. R. 241), proceeded:] We do not feel ourselves bound by these decisions to put a construction upon the statute at variance with the plain and ordinary meaning of its words. It is clear that these decisions have proceeded in part upon a misapprehension of the precise point decided in the case of Burclear v. Eastwoodhay (Burr. S. C. 221; 1 Str. 163). The other reasons assigned in giving these judgments do not appear to us satisfactory.—p. 695.

ESHER, M.R.—There are observations in that case which may be treated in one of two ways—if they are treated as made with regard to the whole section, then they were not necessary for the decision of the case; but it is not fair to so treat them; the Court was there using language with regard to each case mentioned in the section, and none of the language used either by myself or Cotton, L.J. is contrary to this—that the last part of the first clause of sect. 35 applies to the case of a person who is over sixteen at the time when he or she is to be removed, but who has not acquired any settlement other than that which he or she had when the age of sixteen was attained—that is, the settlement of the father or widowed mother.—p. 80.

ESHER, M.R.—The case here is that of a person who had a settlement—namely, her father's—when she attained the age of sixteen, and who, it is said, retains that settlement until she acquires another. Here she has not acquired another, and she therefore retains that settlement which she had at the moment when her case is to be considered—that is, when the removal is to take place. The only case which is really contrary to that view is The Islington Case. I protest that The Bridgnorth Case (supra) is not; there are observations in that case which may be treated in one of two ways—if they are treated as made with regard to the whole section, then they were not necessary for the decision of the case; but it is not fair to so treat them; the Court was there using language with regard to each case mentioned in the section, and none of the language used either by myself or Cotton, L.J. is contrary to this—that the last part of the first clause of sect. 35 applies to the case of a person who is over sixteen at the time when he or she is to be removed, but who has not acquired any settlement other than that which he or she had when the age of sixteen was attained—that is, the settlement of the father or widowed mother. The Islington Case in the Divisional Court, is the only decision which is contrary to that; but it was affirmed by the C. A. upon the understanding that it was the same as The Bridgnorth Case. In my opinion The Bridgnorth Case was rightly decided, and is not in conflict with the present case. The decision of the C. A. in The Islington Case was right if taken upon the assumption that the case was the same as The Bridgnorth Case; but if it is to be dealt with as affirming the decision of the Divisional Court upon a ground other than what I have stated, then the decision of the C. A. was wrong. We have, however, now got The Highworth Case [reversed in H.L. (ante, col. 2152)], and the C. A. being in the position of having two conflicting decisions must differ from one of them, and must, I think, adopt that decision which they think right. In my opinion The Highworth Case was rightly decided, and is a case in which infinite care was taken, and one which makes the law simple.—p. 80.

ESHER, M.R., at the conclusion of the judgments: It must be understood from what has been said that we think the decision of the Divisional Court in The Islington Case was wrong.—p. 82.

BLACKBURN, J.—We find that from Reg. v. Tipton to Reg. v. St. Martin's, New Sarum (9 Q. B. 241), on four occasions when the present question has come before the Court the judges have always held according to the decision in the present case. I quite agree with my lord that they were originally mistaken: but I also think we ought not lightly to upset their judgments. I say that for this reason, viz., that when a case does not go to a Court of Appeal, and we are quite sure that there has been a mistake, we are not bound to follow on in error, but when the matter is not an important point affecting people in general, then communis error facit jus is a maxim which we should apply, unless we see distinctly that the decided cases were founded in mistake, and that the reversal of them would be the greater benefit though unsettling the law.

ROMER, L.J.—Reg. v. Tipton Inhabitants has been followed by a long series of cases ending with St. Saviour's Union v. Dorking Union and cannot now be disregarded by the Court. But those cases are not in themselves wholly satisfactory, and the principle upon which they were decided ought not to be extended to other cases, where the facts are substantially different. . . . It seems to me that when Reg. v. Tipton Inhabitants is looked at, it will be found that the ground of the decision was that the original parish had ceased to exist. This, in my opinion, does not apply to the present case.—p. 302.

CAMPBELL, C.J. (for the Court).—With one exception the decisions upon this statute are all reconcilable with the view we now take of it. That exception is Reg. v. Salford. There the pauper had been residing in the parish of Salford thirteen years preceding the date of the order of removal, except some months during which he was in the house of correction in another parish, under sentence for a misdemeanor; and it was held that this imprisonment should be included in the computation in considering whether he had resided in Salford five years next before the application for the warrant, so as to render him removable. On further consideration of the statute, we think that sufficient effect was not given in that case to the words "for all purposes," and its authority is already considerably shaken by the consequent decision in Reg. v. Holbeck (16 Q. B. 404).—p. 763. (Overruled, infra.)

LORD ESHER, M.R.—This case depends upon the true construction of sect. 34 of the Divided Parishes Act, 1876, and of sect. 1 of the Poor Removal Act, 1846. . . . It is said that the clause [in the latter section] "or as a patient in a hospital" must be read as meaning "provided that the time during which such person shall be confined in a hospital compulsorily shall be excluded in the computation of time"; and the counsel for the Canterbury Union say that it can be shown that a person can be confined in a hospital compulsorily. . . . There is no statute or law in England which permits any person to confine a sick man in a hospital. The truth is that the word "confined" is not applicable to the clause "or as a patient in a hospital" at all. The word which is applicable to that clause is the word "reside," and the clause then reads

"or shall reside as a patient in a hospital." It is said that Reg. v. Hartfield, in which Lord Campbell delivered the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, placed a different construction upon the section. Even if that be so, I think the reasoning of the judgments in Dorchester Union v. Weymouth Union is preferable, and that it is impossible for us to differ from it.—p. 475.

ESHER, M.R.—In the case referred to no settlement was stated, and all that the Court there held was that from the particular circumstances of the case it was difficult to say whether the parish intended to rely upon a birth settlement or some other settlement, and it was therefore decided that the examination was insufficient in that it was too loose. That case, therefore, does not substantiate the argument which was founded upon it. In the present case, however, the settlement which is relied upon is plainly stated.—p. 95.

Rex v. Ferry Frystone (1801) 2 East 53.—K.B. KENYON, C.J.—The point upon which the Court were divided in opinion, in the case of The King v. Eriswell, has been since considered to be so clear against the admissibility of the evidence, either as to the hearsay of the pauper or his examination in writing, that it was abandoned by the counsel at the bar in the case of The King v. Newnham Courtney (1 East's Rep. 373) without argument. It is true there was no evidence there that the pauper, whose examination had been admitted in evidence, was dead; but our opinion against the general doctrine laid down by the two judges who supported the reception of the evidence in the former case was pretty broadly hinted. And, to be sure, that point may now be considered to be at rest.—p. 54.

BLACKBURN, J.—In Guildford v. St. Olave's Union (25 L. T. 803) I explained what I said in Reg. v. Glossop. I never intended to say that having a residence to return to was necessary (p. 469). In the language I am reported to have used in Reg. v. Glossop, and in Reg. v. Stourbridge (34 L. J. M. C. 179), I never meant that the having a dwelling-house to return to was essential and necessary to show an intention to return so as to prevent a break of residence. If I used that language—which very possibly I did—I did not accurately express what I meant, and what I understand to be the law. Whether a person has a house or not to return to is only one element in considering the intention to return.—p. 470.

BAGGALLAY, L.J.—Boycot v. Cotton and Lewis v. Freke . . . establish this, . . . that the donee of a power to charge has a right to fix the rate of interest; but they were cases in which there was a donee of the power who had the right of directing whether the charge should be raised, or to what extent it should be raised. If you examine Lewis v. Freke closely, it will be found, and particularly from a passage in Lord Eldon's judgment, that the rule, that a donee of a power to charge has a right to fix the rate of interest, does not apply to a case where the trustees have a trust vested in them to raise a specific sum of money, and the only power given to anybody in connection with the money so raised, is to state in what proportion the money is to be divided between the parties, and at what time it shall be payable. Lord Eldon used this expression about the middle of his judgment (p. 512): "If the party entitled to charge or to give interest from the time the fund is to be productive, fixes the rate, the Court cannot control it or diminish it, if he gives more than 4 per cent., or increase it, if he gives less than legal interest. Therefore the course of this Court obtains only where no rate is specified by him who has a right to fix the sum and any rate of interest he thinks proper, not exceeding legal interest." . . . Young v. Waterpark (Lord) has been quoted as an authority that the rate of interest should in the present case be 4 per cent., as being the rate of interest according to the lex fori. The last edition of Mr. Lewin's book [7th ed. p. 376] brings the cases down to a recent period, viz., 1879; it was published after his death. I gather from it that he did not regard Young v. Waterpark (Lord) as the case of an Irish estate being dealt with in England, and therefore giving effect to the law of the forum, and not to the law of the country where the property was situate; but as a case in which the property was dealt with as English property. In that case there was both English and Irish land, and it would have been almost impossible for the Court to direct a sum of money to be raised out of English and Irish property together, and to direct that on so much as was raised out of English property 4 per cent. should be paid, and on so much as was raised out of Irish property, 5 per cent. That would have led to confusion. The English Court was dealing with the property. . . . With reference to Young v. Waterpark (Lord), I desire to add that, unless the decision can be explained in the manner I have stated, it is, in my opinion, at variance with the recognised line of authority.—pp. 477, 478.

FRY, J.—In that case [Plunkett v. Lewis] Wigram, V.-C. considered elaborately the authorities bearing upon this particular question, and he laid down the rule in these terms: "Where a debt exists from a parent to a child, the advance made upon the child's marriage, or upon some other occasion, of a portion equal to or exceeding the debt, in the parent's lifetime, shall prima facie be considered a satisfaction." The presumption, therefore, arises the moment I find that the portion is equal to or exceeding the debt. . . I find that a covenant by a father to pay a sum of money was, in Chave v. Farrant, considered to extinguish a present liability by him to pay the amount, and yet it is impossible not to see that the right of immediate payment in cash is a different thing from the covenant which was contained in the marriage settlement.—pp. 84, 85.

COTTON, L.J.—Great reliance was placed upon the judgment of the H. L. in Chichester (Lord) v. Coventry, where it was said that the circumstances of the gift to the daughter were analogous to the condition "subject to the charges and incumbrances thereon" in this case. But the decision there was different. In that case the gift by will was of a share in a division of residue, and after payment thereof of all debts, and their lordships relied upon this, that the provision made for the daughter was a debt, and that the debts were all to be paid before the residue was divided, and accordingly that the shares of the ultimate residue could not be given on an implied condition that the daughter should give up the claim to her debt. And I doubt whether if there had not been the direction to pay debts before the gift of the residue they would have come to that conclusion. The L.C., Lord Chelmsford, in his judgment recognises the rule to which I have referred, and says:—"In determining in any particular case whether a gift by a parent, or a person in loco parentis, is intended to be in addition to, or in substitution for, a prior gift by the same person, it must always be borne in mind that there is a presumption, or, as Lord Eldon expressed it in Pye, &c. parte (col. 2185), 'a sort of feeling upon what is called a leaning against double portions.'" Then he quotes Sir J. Leach [Weall v. Rice (col. 2191)]:—"This presumption may be repelled or fortified by intrinsic evidence derived from the nature of the two provisions. Where the two provisions are of the same nature, or there are but slight differences, the two instruments afford intrinsic evidence against a double provision. Where the two provisions are of a different nature, the two instruments afford intrinsic evidence in favour of a double provision." Then Lord Cranworth says:—"Neither party in the argument of this case disputed the rule acted on in Courts of equity, that there is a presumption against double portions. I have more than once had occasion to express my opinion that this is a useful rule, carrying generally into effect the intention of parents and others making provision for those for whom they are bound to provide." So both of their lordships fully recognise this rule, although they do perhaps use expressions more easily departing from it than other judges have done; and there are undoubtedly circumstances in that case very different and stronger than such slight evidence of intention as is shown by the words in this case "subject to the charges and incumbrances thereon." As there is this rule against double portions, and we cannot put an end to it, it is much better that the rule, if a bad one—Lord Cranworth says it is a good one—should be put an end to by legislative enactment or otherwise, than that we should reduce it to nothing by departing from it on such very slight grounds as exist in the present will; and it will be remembered that Turner, L.J., whose decision in Coventry v. Chichester (col. 2179) was affirmed by the H. L., said that there must be strong evidence upon the instrument to enable the child to get the double portion.—p. 537.

BOWEN, L.J. to the same effect.

FRY, L.J. (dissenting).—The particular way in which the presumption against double portions applies to a case like the present, is by the implication or introduction by presumption of a condition, which is of course not expressed, that the legacy given by the will shall be taken in satisfaction of the covenant. That was plainly expressed in the judgment of the C. A., delivered by Cotton, L.J. in Tussaud v. Tussaud (post, col. 2181), in which he says this: "Where the obligation is earlier in date than the will, the testator, when he makes his will, is under a liability which he cannot revoke or avoid. He can only put an end to it by payment, or by making a gift with the condition, express or implied, that the legatees shall take the gift made by the will in satisfaction of their claim under the previous obligation." It has accordingly been held by the H. L., in Chichester (Lord) v. Coventry, that, in the case of the satisfaction of the portion previously secured by a will, slighter circumstances are adequate to repel the presumption against double portions than they are in the case in which the gift by way of settlement follows the will.—p. 546.

(for self, JAMES and BRETT, L.JJ.).—There are very few cases in which a gift by will has been held a satisfaction of a previous liability, in which the persons interested under the will have not included all interested under the previous settlement. McCarogher v. Whieldon was, however, such a case. But the decision in that case cannot be considered as proceeding on a principle inconsistent with our present decision. There, by the settlement, the testator had covenanted to leave one-fifth of his residuary estate to trustees for his son for life, then for his intended wife for life, and afterwards for their children; and all that the M.R. in that case decided was that an absolute bequest to the son of one-fifth of the testator's estate, was a satisfaction of the life interest which the son took under the father's covenant in one-fifth of his estate.—p. 380.

STIRLING, J.—The rule against double portions is generally stated to apply to provisions made by a parent or person in loco parentis; but in all the cases, so far as they have been brought to my attention, the parent referred to is the father. [His lordship discussed Powys v. Mansfield (post, col. 2182), and continued:] In Montague v. Montague the rule against double portions was held applicable to appointments made in exercise of a special power. It appears, however, that the appointor was the father of the appointees, and that the appointed funds consisted of sums made chargeable by way of portions for younger children on estates settled by himself on his marriage. The appointed funds therefore were "portions" in the strictest sense.—p. 734.

Hutchinson v. Tottenham [1898] 1 Ir. R. 403. CHATTERTON, V.-C.—It is a very different case from Montague v. Montague, where there were two separate settlements, each with its own hotch-pot clause applying to the property thereby settled. The fact that these funds came from different parties is, in my opinion, in itself immaterial. There seems to have been a plain intention that this single hotch-pot clause should apply to all the funds without distinction. In Grey (Earl) v. Grey there was no such indication of intention, and the question was whether a hotch-pot clause was incorporated by a general reference to the trusts, powers, provisos, and agreements expressed in reference to another and distinct fund.—p. 422.

KAY, J.—In Pye, Ex parte (post, col. 2185). Lord Eldon defines "locus parentis" as being "the situation of the person described as the lawful father of that child." This definition, which is little more than a literal translation, is adopted by Lord Cottenham in Powys v. Mansfield (Lord); and in Pym v. Lockyer (post), the same learned judge said that, for the purpose of the rule against double portions, whether the donor had assumed the office of a parent may be proved by extrinsic evidence, such as the general conduct of the donor towards the children, or by intrinsic evidence from the nature and terms of the gift.—p. 190.

SELBORNE, L.C.—When a testator gives a legacy to a child, or to any other person towards whom he has taken on himself parental obligations, and afterwards makes a gift or enters into a binding contract in his lifetime in favour of the same legatee, then (unless there be distinctions between the nature and conditions of the two gifts, of a kind not in this case material) there is a presumption prima facie that both gifts were made to fulfil the same natural or moral obligation of providing for the legatee; and consequently that the gift inter vivos is either wholly or in part a substitution for, or an "ademption" of, the legacy. This presumption has in some cases of that class (see particularly Hopwood v. Hopwood (post, col. 2192), been carried to a great length. It was at one time thought, that the ademption in such a case would be (prima facie) total, although the amount of the subsequent advancement might be less than that of the legacy. But in Pym v. Lockyer, in which the doctrine was carefully examined and explained by Lord Cottenham, that learned judge corrected this error, and the rule established by Pym v. Lockyer is, that when the donor is a parent, or in loco parentis, and when the amount of the subsequent gift is less than that of the legacy, the mere presumption does not go beyond an ademption pro tanto.—p. 556.

JESSEL, M.R.—It is said that that case [Holmes v. Holmes] decided that a share in stock-in-trade was not a satisfaction of a pecuniary legacy, and, taking the report as it stands, it is impossible to say that it was not so decided. Still, I am not prepared to say that even a share in a stock-in-trade, if declared to be taken at a specific value, would not be a satisfaction of a portion; but I cannot discover from the report, which is very brief, what the facts really were. In that case a father by will gave his son 500*l.*, and afterwards took him into partnership, the stock being by the deed of partnership declared to be 3,000*l.*, to be brought in equally by the partners, and they were to be equally entitled to the profits. It is stated that "the father brought in the whole capital, and it was understood by the whole family that he meant to give his son the half of the stock," but it is not clearly stated whether this was actually done. Nor again does it appear that the stock was actually worth as much as 3,000*l.*, or what it was worth, at the time of the execution of the articles. We have not sufficient information about the circumstances to make that case a guide to us in the present case. The other case is Bengough v. Walker. I agree that some of the criticisms on it made by the counsel for the appellant were well founded, and the report is certainly not quite satisfactory, but I think we can find out what Sir W. Grant really meant. A father gave to his child a share of a mill, and directed it to be made up to the value of 10,000*l.*, and it was held that that was a satisfaction of a portion of 2,000*l.* The question argued was whether a share of a mill could be a satisfaction of a legacy, because a legacy must be satisfied by something of the same kind. . . . The true meaning of that is [viz., what Sir W. Grant says on p. 514], that where a testator gives to a child a beneficial lease or share of works, or any other thing, and says nothing about the value, he is not to be taken to be giving it in satisfaction of a pecuniary bequest; but where he does refer to the value, the presumption of satisfaction may arise. And when he gives it as being of larger amount than the legacy and the legatee takes it, he takes it at the estimated amount, and in that case it makes no difference, whether the testator directs the thing to be sold and gives him the proceeds, or directs the thing to be taken as a specific amount. In either case he shows his intention to give a definite amount.—p. 88. And see post, col. 2185.

NORTH, J.—I see nothing in the nature of the property given to prevent the rule against double portions applying, and the gift of the business to both or either of the sons being a satisfaction pro tanto of his or their share in the residue. Three cases cited seem to be in point, and two of them, Bengough v. Walker, and Lawes, In re, show that there is nothing in the nature of the property to rebut the presumption against double portions. The third and older case, Holmes v. Holmes, seems to have been, and was, recognised in Lawes, In re, as a special case depending on special circumstances; but in both the other cases it was recognised that a share in a business is a thing capable of being taken in satisfaction of a gift of personal estate. In Bengough v. Walker, which was a case of satisfaction, not ademption, the thing given by will was a share in powder mills.—p. 532. [His lordship discussed these cases at length.]

JAMES, L.J.—The origin of the rule as applied to legacies is this, that where a father makes a provision for his children leaving them legacies, and afterwards gives a portion to one of those children, it is supposed from what is known to be the ordinary intention of testators, that he did not intend to make any real difference between his children, and that the child advanced in his lifetime, takes the advance pro tanto by way of ademption. No doubt that has been necessarily applied to the advantage of residuary legatees, because where the legacy fails, or is satisfied, or is adeemed from the very nature of the case, the residuary legatee who takes his chance gets the benefit of that as he would the burden of any diminution. That is the state of the law with regard to legacies. It is true the rule was applied to a share in a residue in the case of Montefiore v. Guedalla, which was a case in which I observe that Knight Bruce, L.J. expressed great doubt as to the law, but he was satisfied in concurring in the decision, because the common sense of the thing was in favour of the decision in that particular case. But what was done in Montefiore v. Guedalla, in my view of it, was not an application of any such view as is here contended for, but was an application of the general principle which was supposed to underlie the rule, and of which the rule was only an application and an illustration. The principle is, that it must be presumed that a father intends equality between the children; and, if he leaves the residue to the children, and afterwards makes an advance to one of the children, the general rule is, that such advance must be brought into hotch-pot, so that the disposition of his fortune, by which he intended to introduce equality among his children, may not be altered.—p. 672.

SELBORNE, L.C.—The other cases [of this class] upon which decisions have been given or opinions expressed, have been cases in which—I am speaking of the strongest of them—you have such words as “give or advance,” “give or settle,” which were words that in some of those cases were taken to include what I will admit they might, by possibility in some contexts mean, execute in the lifetime of an instrument which will operate when it comes into operation as a settlement or as a gift. And Sir W. Grant, in Onslow v. Michell, laid no inconsiderable stress upon the force which he thought in that respect might be ascribed to the words “give and settle,” which you have not in this instrument. The same, or similar words, also occurred, I will not say in every one of the cases which have been cited before us, but in almost all of them, and in all those upon which material stress was laid, particularly Golding v. Haverfield, in the Court of Ex. and in the original case, which in other respects also was distinguishable, of Richman v. Morgan (supra). In that state of things I think we should be extending much further than they have ever yet been carried, and to a case in which the natural and proper meaning of the words used would make it unfit to apply them, even if they were right, authorities which, when examined, are in themselves almost remarkable examples of the extraordinary manner in which the use of precedents in the Courts of this country causes the Courts, first of all, to slide into manifest error, and afterwards to follow that error upon the notion that they are bound by it. The history of the doctrine relied upon as being now established by the authorities is this. In Richman v. Morgan, before Lord Thurlow, there were words which said that if, during a man's life, or at his death, he should do a certain thing, it should have a certain effect; the word “give” being there used, and not “advance” or “pay.” It was perfectly manifest that in that case what was done by the will took effect at the testator's death, and was within the plain words of the instrument, and nothing was decided in that case or even said, as far as I can see, which would lead you to anything farther. Then came Twisden v. Twisden, in 1804 before Lord Eldon, in which Richman v. Morgan was referred to, and Lord Eldon, evidently to my mind, expressed on the whole an opinion to the effect that, notwithstanding what had been suggested tentatively in the argument, and not confidently at all on this subject, the natural interpretation of these words was the right one, and that a thing was not to be held to be done during the lifetime of a man which only took effect after his death. Lord Eldon there said (at p. 426): “If the law is that what is to be taken under a will is not an advancement in the life of the party, it is very difficult to say that what is taken under an intestacy shall be an advancement. And though it is true the will must be made in the life, it is equally true nothing is advanced or given to the party to take till after the death.” The expression of opinion, as far as it goes, is this, that he first concludes that what is taken under a will is not an advancement in the life of the party, and then says that a fortiori what is taken by way of intestacy is not an advancement in the life of the party, which is the particular point decided in that case. Then came Leake v. Leake in the very next year, before Lord Eldon, and in that case Sir S. Romilly and other counsel for the plaintiffs, who were interested in contending that there was no satisfaction, said that they did not mean to argue it. The words are: “The plaintiffs cannot contend that a provision by will must not be considered a provision given in the lifetime of the testator after Richman v. Morgan, and Twisden v. Twisden, though if that distinction can be maintained, two of these children, G. and A., had not being advanced in the life of their father, and have no provision except by the will.” And then they went on with other arguments, which prevailed in the result, and upon which, for reasons which I do not feel called upon to attempt to explain, they preferred to rely. But the only thing that is material for us, that those eminent and learned counsel said they could not contend that a provision by will must not be considered as if it were given in the lifetime of the testator after Rickman v. Morgan and Twisden v. Twisden. We have referred to Rickman v. Morgan and Twisden v. Twisden, and we find in those cases no warrant whatever for that proposition. Then Lord Eldon, in Leake v. Leake, the matter not having been argued before him, and having the year before expressed a different opinion in Twisden v. Twisden, is reported to have said (at p. 489): "It is truly said that a provision by will is to be considered an advancement in the lifetime to the party. That has been repeatedly decided, and is not to be disturbed." It had been so put before him by counsel, but the matter had not been argued, and I suppose even Lord Eldon was capable, when counsel treated a thing as not arguable, but as decided, of placing confidence in that statement. The learned reporter has been unable to find anything but Rickman v. Morgan, and Twisden v. Twisden, to support that doctrine, and it is a very remarkable thing that, when Lord Eldon came to deliver his final opinion in that very case, he used language which draws the distinction, for he says (at p. 492): "My opinion, rather than a judgment, upon this case is, that, according to the real intention and legal effect of all the instruments, money advanced by the father, as preferment in marriage, or on any other occasion, is an advancement within the proviso; that the devise and bequest of the real and personal estate is not in this case an advancement in the life of the father." . . . He had determined expressly, as I understand him, that of two constructions which were possible—that narrower construction being one, and a wider construction which would take in an advancement not only upon marriage, which must be in the lifetime of the father, but upon any other occasion—the larger was to be preferred, and so it had been argued before him; and he found that an intention that the provision actually made by will should not be taken in satisfaction of the portion was in that case sufficiently manifested. It was not therefore in any way whatever, in any point of view, a necessary ingredient in the judgment that Lord Eldon should entertain or express the opinion he did on that particular point. Sir W. Grant examined the matter afterwards in Ouslow v. Mitchell, in which, as I have said, he relied on the words "give and settle," and said he could find no foundation for the doctrine except those two cases of Rickman v. Morgan and Twisden v. Twisden, which, however, evidently were not authorities for it; but Sir W. Grant said that he thought it was involved in the decision [in Leake v. Leake] not adverting to the fact that it was not necessary in that case that the advancement, in order to be a satisfaction, should have been made on the occasion of the marriage in the lifetime of the father, because the settlement contained the important additional words "or otherwise provided for." The particular decision, after all, of Sir W. Grant, is rested on the force of the words, "settle and give." Golding v. Haverfield is also rested on similar words, and, I must say, upon a somewhat exaggerated weight given, not merely to the extra-judicial dictum of Lord Eldon [in Leake v. Leake], but to the fact that the counsel for the plaintiff in that case did not argue the point.—p. 161.

WOOD, V.-C.—Whatever might have been the result of my consideration of Folkes v. Western, it would have been difficult for me to depart from the view taken of that decision by Wigram, V.-C., in Douglas v. Willes (supra), that, as the point was decided so long ago by Sir W. Grant, and the decision has been sanctioned in Noel v. Walsingham (Lord) (supra), it would be improper for me, even if I differed from it on principle, to do more than indicate my dissent, and leave it to be considered by a higher tribunal. But I cannot come to the conclusion that the decision in Folkes v. Western is wrong in principle, although perhaps some of the reasons given for the decision may not satisfy my judgment, if I may say so with great submission with respect to a case decided by so great an authority as Sir W. Grant.—p. 630.

He adds, what I entirely concur with, "and any comment upon it would now be worse than useless." But after the decision of Kippen v. Darley it is no longer competent to your lordships to assume
- O.C.
- that the rule of law—the presumption arising from what are called double portions—is applicable to the law of Scotland. That was a decision upon that very question in this House. . . . Now, although the two sets of provisions are very different, both in their application and in the decisions upon them, there is one observation which was made by Sir J. Leach with reference to the English rule which is, to my mind, applicable to the Scottish rule. Sir J. Leach said, in Weall v. Rice: "It is not possible to define what are to be considered as slight differences between two provisions." "Slight differences," he adds—and one cannot help observing that after the learned judge had said it is not possible to define, he begins with something like a definition—"are such as, in the opinion of the judge, leave the two provisions substantially of the same nature; and every judge must decide that question"—of what are slight differences—"for himself." My lords, I believe that to be perfectly true as applicable to the construction of the instrument now under your lordships' consideration, and although I propose to mention one or two differences between the two provisions, I protest against anybody hereafter arguing from the particular provisions to which I refer that I am laying down, or affecting to lay down, any general proposition which governs other instruments.—p. 100.

ROMILLY, M.R.—The question here is whether the general power could be exercised during coverture. I think it could. The general rule is that a general power is not to be cut down to a limited one, except by something in the settlement showing a clear intention that it is to be cut down. In Bristow v. Warde (1794) 2 Ves. 336; post, col. 2264 and Gould v. Gould it was considered that there was sufficient to show such an intention. Here I think there is an indication of a contrary one.—p. 791.

Dighton the case was this: John Tomlinson, seised in fee of the land in question, devises the premises to his wife Margaret for her life, and then to be at her disposal, provided it be to any of her children if living: if not, to any of his kindred that his wife should please. That is perfectly different from the words here, which are, "at her decease to make a distribution and disposal." There the property was to be at her disposal any way, and not merely at her decease.—p. 375.

CHITTY, J.—In that case [Smith v. Houblon] the father had an exclusive power of appointment amongst children over a fund which, in default of appointment, was limited to them equally; and as representative of a deceased son he was, in default of appointment, beneficially entitled to one-third of the fund, and he assigned the one-third to his mortgagees, and released the power. Lord Romilly held that the power had been effectually destroyed. The very same objection arose in that case as was suggested here—namely, that the person releasing the power was thereby acquiring a personal benefit. If, therefore, the same rules were to be applied to releases of powers and the exercise of powers, Smith v. Houblon was wrongly decided. But that case has been considered by the C. A. in Radcliffe, In re, and the Court followed it, and declined to follow the decision of Shadwell, V.-C., in Cunynghame v. Thurlow. In Radcliffe, In re, the father was entitled to his deceased son's reversionary interest in the fund as his administrator; and although it appears from the report that a point was raised as to the father's life interest and the son's reversion being held by the father in different rights, there were, as I am now informed by Mr. Byrne and Mr. Farwell, who were counsel in Radcliffe, In re, substantially no debts for the son's administrator to pay. It was therefore plain that the father was augmenting the beneficial interest he took under the settlement. That appears to me to be by itself a sufficient authority binding me to hold that the fact that the release by a father in a case like this will benefit himself is not a ground for saying that the release is void.—p. 264.

FARWELL, J.—It is true that in Cunynghame v. Thurlow, in a case in which a father, who was an executor of his dead child, partially released his power of appointment in order to entitle himself to payment of a share of certain trust funds, Shadwell, V.-C. viewed his conduct with such reprobation as to say that it disentitled him to the payment he desired. This case, however, was subject to observation by the C. A. in Radcliffe, In re, and the Court, in my opinion, has no jurisdiction to refuse payment out to a man of that which is his own property.—p. 194.

SHADWELL, V.-C.—The judgment attributed to the L.C. in the case cited is not very intelligible; but the effect of it seems to be that, after the husband and wife had exercised the power, jointly, it could not be exercised by the survivor of them. KINDERSLEY, V.-C.—Certainly, in Simpson v. Paul, Lord Northington does seem to hold that, as a general proposition, the exercise of a primary power to a partial extent does preclude any exercise of the secondary power. But Lord St. Leonards has expressed his opinion very strongly that the view of Lord Northington is wrong (see Sugden on Powers, 6th ed. vol. ii. pp. 218, 235); and I think I am justified in adopting the view of Lord St. Leonards, that the partial execution of a primary power does not exclude the exercise of a secondary power.—p. 519.

KEKEWICH, J.—Several cases were referred to which are quoted by Lord St. Leonards in his work on Powers [Sugden on Powers, 8th ed. ch. vii. s. 9], as laying down the rule about which I apprehend there is really no doubt. One is Leicester's (Earl) Case, which cited Kibbet v. Lee, and is therefore valuable as containing that quotation as a matter of authority, "that if a deed of revocation had been made" (in that case it was a deed of revocation), "and the party had declared it should not take place until 100*l.* paid, there the operation of it would have been in suspense until the 100*l.* paid, and then it would have been sufficient." And in harmony with that, we find the second resolution in Digges' Case. There, again, it was a power of revocation: it was resolved that "where the revocation is to be made by deed indented to be enrolled, it is as much as to say by deed indented and enrolled, for no revocation shall be in the same case until the deed be enrolled, for if it should be a revocation before the enrolment, then per adventure the deed would never be enrolled, which would be against the words and intents of the parties."—p. 657.

CHITTY, J.—The principle laid down in Wilkinson v. Schneider is firmly established, that under a general testamentary power of appointment such as this the trustees of the settlement creating the power are bound to hand over the trust funds in their hands to the persons named by the donee of the power, and therefore the trusts in default of appointment cannot arise. In the case of the exercise of such a power by a man the rule is clear. In the case of a married woman, which is the case before me, the late M.R. has decided in Pinède's Settlement, In re (post), that the married woman can make the fund her own by exercising the power.—p. 525.

ROMER, J.—Pinède's Settlement, In re, was a case where Sir G. Jessel, under circumstances referred to by him in his judgment, was able to ascertain that the testatrix intended to include in the gift of her residue both the residue of the appointed fund and any savings of her own property she might possess as one blended fund, and treated the appointed property as her own, and made it her own for all purposes. Davies' Trusts, In re, was cited, and in no way disapproved by the M.R.; on the contrary, he refers with approval to De Lusi's Trusts, In re, which followed Davies' Trusts, In re, as stating accurately the principle on which each case ultimately falls to be decided. Ickeringill's Estate, In re, decided by Hall, V.-C., was a peculiar case, and I think turned upon this—that the V.-C. thought, under the circumstances, concerning the devise of real estate to which he refers in his judgment, that the gift in the testatrix's will in that case was equivalent to an appointment and devise to her two sisters in trust, so as to make the question one of resulting trust, as in Van Hagen, In re. At least, that is what I gather from the judgment, especially from the observations at the bottom of p. 156 and top of p. 157 of the Law Reports (p. 365 in Law Journal Reports); but whether I am right in this or not, it is clear that the V.-C. distinguished the case before him from that of Davies' Trusts, In re, and cast no doubt upon the decision in the latter case. Lastly, in Coxen v. Rowland the decision of Stirling, J.

turned upon the words used by the testatrix, which indicated sufficiently her intention that the appointed property should be deemed hers for all purposes. As pointed out in that case, it is not essential in order that an appointed fund may be for all purposes taken out of the instrument creating the power, that there should be in the first instance an appointment to a trustee. Nor did Wickens, V.C. in Davies' Trusts, In re, express a contrary view, and the suggestion that the reasoning on which he decided that case has been since decided to be unsound appears to me to be unfounded.—p. 615.

HALL, V.-C.—In Falkner v. Butler, under a limited power of appointment, the donee appointed a sum to persons not objects of the power, and this sum was held to pass under the appointment of the residue, i.e., it fell into the residue. . . . In Carter v. Taggart, the testatrix, exercising a power over a specified sum, gave part of it to a person who died before her, and gave all the rest and residue of the sum "after deducting therefrom the legacies above mentioned." The part which lapsed was held to fall into the residue. This decision, I think, turned upon the particular will, indicating (particularly by a life estate being given in part with a direction that that part should fall into the residue) an intention that all should pass, subject only to the charge. . . . In Easum v. Appleford (post), which was a case of an appointment under a power, Lord Cottenham considered that the fund was a definite one, that the last disposition, though of "residue," was in substance to be read as if the amount had been inserted in the disposition. In Harries' Trust, In re (post), Wood, V.-C. held upon the whole instrument, that a lapsed share of a definite sum passed under an appointment of the residue of the moneys after deducting certain specified sums. He considered Carter v. Tuggart and Falkner v. Butler to apply, rather than Easum v. Appleford.—p. 957.

Schneider* (supra, col. 2201), and Van Hagen, In re (supra, col. 2202), are examples and without success. So far as the present case is concerned it does not apply, because when the date of the will is looked at, it appears that it was made in 1835, that is, before the Wills Act came into force. That circumstance, no doubt, explains a good deal of what was said in that case.—p. 817.

SELBORNE, L.C. (for self, COTTON and BAGGALLAY).—Sir L. Shadwell in Griffiths v. Gale decided that this provision of the statute [1 Vict. c. 27, s. 33] did not extend to the case of an appointee under a limited power. That decision had the assent and approval of Lord St. Leonards, Sugden on Powers [6th ed., vol. i., p. 385], and also of Lord Hatherley in Eccles v. Cheyne. It was said, and truly, by Lord Hatherley, that some of the observations made by Sir L. Shadwell were inapplicable, if they were supposed to go beyond the case before him, and to extend to that of a general power. But we see no reason for supposing that the learned judge who decided Griffiths v. Gale had, when he made those observations, any other case in view than that which was before him of a limited power. If the reasons on which Griffiths v. Gale was decided had been in themselves unsatisfactory, there would still be great difficulty in disturbing what has been regarded as settled law for the last forty years, a law on which many titles may possibly depend. But we are ourselves satisfied with the reasons for that decision (p. 270). . . . The late M.R., indeed, in Freme v. Clement, a case decided on the 25th section of the Act [1 Vict. c. 26], seems to have thought it possible to collect from the general provisions of the Wills Act an intention to use those words in a sensu primâ facie inclusive of appointments under limited as well as general powers. We might have been doubtful of our own opinion if it were merely our own, when we found it opposed to that of so eminent a judge; but in this case all previous authority is in accordance with it.—p. 272.

JESSEL, M.R.—Frowd's Settlement, In re, does not bind me upon a question of real estate ; and I will say further that I should hold it not binding upon me upon a question of personal estate either, if I were at liberty to do so.—p. 751. [His lordship then discussed the other cases at length and continued:] The result, therefore, is a most singular state of authority. First, there is a decision of Stuart, V.-C. [Lee v. Olding], holding that the interest of the appointee was acquired under the appointment and not under the original settlement. Then there is a decision of Wood, V.-C. [Frowd's Settlement, In re], distinctly holding that the appointment did not divest the interest under the settlement. Then there is a decision of the C.A., affirming a second decision of Stuart, V.-C. [Vizard's Trusts, In re], on the distinct ground that the appointment conferred a new interest. Then there is a decision of Malins, V.-C. [De Serre v. Clarke], following the two decisions of Stuart, V.-C., not on principle, but because of the expression of opinion of Turner, L.J., though agreeing with the decision of Wood, V.-C.—p. 754.

STIRLING, L.J.—As a general rule, there can be no question that the exercise of a power of appointment divests the estates limited in default of appointment and creates new estates—see Farwell on Powers (2nd ed.), p. 276. Accordingly, where the same person took both under the appointment and in default of appointment, it was held by the C.A. in Chancery that the estate of the appointee is a new estate, provided it differs in quantum of interest from that conferred by the limitations in default of appointment—Vizard's Trusts, In re (supra, col. 2206)—the difference between the two interests being that under the appointment the appointee took absolutely, while in default of appointment he only took contingently. In Sweetapple v. Horlock, the M.R. (Sir G. Jessel) held, notwithstanding some conflict of authority, that the appointee took a new estate, although the interest under the appointment did not differ from that which was conferred on him in default of appointment ; and this decision appears to be in strict accordance with principle.—p. 296.

JOYCE, J.—There [Thompson v. Towne] the testator at the time of his death, having a power of appointment by will over a sum of 500*l.*, exercised such power by his will in favour of legatees. Somers, L.K. decreed the 500*l.* to be assets to pay the debt of the plaintiff, a creditor, and it is stated in the report that on appeal to H. L. this decree was affirmed, but upon what precise ground does not appear. Where the power is to appoint by deed or will, the appointee under an appointment by deed for a good consideration takes in priority to creditors. Thus, for example, in Lassels v. Cornwallis (Lord) (supra), Lord Cornwallis in the settlement on his marriage reserved a power to charge an estate with any sum not exceeding 3,000*l.* for such purposes as he should think fit. Upon a sale he by deed appointed this 3,000*l.* to the purchaser as a collateral security for the enjoyment of his purchase, and if no incumbrance arose the appointment was to be void. No incumbrance having arisen, by will he bequeathed the 3,000*l.* Wright, L.K., following Thompson v. Towne, decreed the 3,000*l.* to be assets of Lord Cornwallis, and subject to the collateral security to be applicable in payment of debts. . . . So also in Ewart v. Ewart (post, col. 2209) Lord Hatherley, then V.-C., says, where a person has a general power of appointment, the subject of the power being liable to his debts, and he executed the power in favour of volunteers, the Court draws out from the volunteers so much as is necessary for satisfying the debts.—p. 788.

TURNER, L.J.—Property, whether personal or real, over which a testator has a general power is liable for his debts—as to the personal estate for all his debts, and as to the real estate at all events for his specialty debts, but such property is not the personal or real estate of the testator. The mode in which the Court dealt with a case of this description in Bainton v. Ward, as appears from the declaration in the decree in that case, which is set out in the note to Holmes v. Coghill, 7 Ves. 502 (supra), seems to me to show that personal estate, or real estate appointed by a testator, is to be applied only in aid of the assets which are really the property of the testator.—p. 979.

KAY, J.—There is no doubt that, in case of a man who has a general power of appointment and exercises it by will in favour of volunteers, the property so appointed will be considered as assets for the payment of his debts. And this doctrine was applied by Lord Hardwicke, in Townshend (Lord) v. Windham, to the exercise of a general power even when exercised by deed so as to take effect on the death of the appointor; his lordship saying: "In respect of his creditors it must be considered as part of his estate at the time of his death; he having executed it so as to gain the interest to himself, and attempted to pass it at the same time to his daughter: the Court will not suffer it; saying he has been guilty of a fraud as to them being indebted at the time." This decision proceeded upon the statute 13 Eliz. c. 5. In Holmes v. Coghill

(post). Sir W. Grant treats the doctrine as settled, where the appointment by will has been actually made: and there is a note [7 Ves. 503] of the decree in Bainton v. Ward (2 Atk. 172, see supra, col. 2209), before Lord Hardwicke—a case in which such a power was exercised by will: and it was thereby declared that the fund appointed was to be considered part of the testator's personal estate liable to the satisfaction of his debts. But does this law apply to the case of a married woman?—p. 487. [His lordship held that it did not.]

BYRNE, J.—The rule is that property subject to general powers of appointment becomes assets for the payment of the appointor's debts, if the power is actually exercised in favour of volunteers; and Lord Hardwicke, in Townshend (Lord) v. Windham, points out that "If there is a power to execute by will or deed, though executed by will, it operates not as a will to that purpose, but as an appointment; not as an appointment of his own assets, but of the estate of another, and takes not place by force of the will."—p. 781.

V. WILLIAMS, L.J.—Now in Fleming v. Buchanan Knight Bruce, L.J., in the passage cited by Joyce, J. in his judgment, says: "On whatever grounds it was originally so held, it is and has for a long time been the settled law of the country, that if a man having a power, and a power only, over personal estate to appoint it as he will, exercises the power by a testamentary appointment, the property becomes subject in a certain order and manner to the payment of his debts, whatever may be the intention or absence of intention on his part." Our attention was called to the fact that Knight Bruce, L.J. in this passage does not use the word "volunteer" at all, and it is suggested that the rule as laid down by the L.J. applies equally whether the person in whose favour the general power is exercised is a creditor or a volunteer. I sometimes doubt myself whether the L.J. did intend to lay down the rule as widely as this, and I am not sure that it would have been right so to do. It will be observed that the L.J. was dealing with a case in which the general power was exercised by testamentary appointment, and in which there was no suggestion of an antecedent charge, or of a covenant to exercise the power, and in which there is nothing to show that there was any power exercisable by deed as well as by will. Now if one applies the rule laid down by the L.J. to a case of the exercise by testamentary appointment of a power only exercisable by will, it does not seem to matter one bit whether we limit the rule as to the exercise of a general power of appointment making the subject of it assets for the payment of the appointor's debts to volunteers or do not do so, because in my opinion in such a case every one who takes under the will exercising the power necessarily takes as a volunteer.—p. 897.

STIRLING, L.J.—In that case [Newnham's Estate, In re] the testatrix, having a power of appointment by will, had induced the trustees of the will creating the power to pay over a portion of the fund to her in her lifetime, and she made a will by which she exercised her testamentary power of appointment by directing that the trustees should hold the fund upon trust to pay and indemnify themselves against the advances which had been made to her, and subject thereto upon trust for certain beneficiaries. After the death of the testatrix the general creditors contended that by appointing the fund she had made it available for payment of her debts, and that the trustees must make good the portions of the fund which they had misapplied before they could prove against the estate for the advances. The V.-C. rejected that contention, saying that as the creditors of the donee of the power could not get at the property subject thereto except through the appointment, they could not take it without recognising the other acts of the testatrix. The report is a short one and the grounds for the decision are not clearly stated, but I apprehend that the V.-C. meant this: Suppose the creditors of the testatrix had asked for payment to themselves of the whole fund, the trustees who had made the advances would have a right to say, We have already paid a portion of the fund to the testatrix, and it is already part of her assets, and therefore you cannot call upon us to replace it. I think also that the general creditors would not stand in any better position than the executors through whom they claimed, and that the act of the appointor referred to by the V.-C. was the act of her taking possession in her life time of part of the fund subject to the power.—p. 898. FRY, J.—I am not convinced that Lord Redesdale's language or his meaning [in Jackson v. Innes] extends to the kind of case which is now before me, where the settlement was made subject to an absolute power of appointment in the husband and wife, giving them entire control over the property, and enabling them to do what they liked with it. . . . There is no ambiguity, according to my construction of the deed, and it is not therefore a case which comes within the principle laid down in Jackson v. Innes.—p. 215.

BYRNE, J.—Passing to Hoskin's Trusts, In re, I do not myself think that James, L.J., meant to express the opinion that the executor was entitled to receive the fund "as such," but that he must prove the will and constitute himself executor before he could ask to have the fund handed over. The production of probate would be necessary as proof of title on the part of the executor in his capacity as a person nominated to administer the fund and as showing an appointment,—p. 778.

EADY, J.—It is settled by Philbrick's Settlement, In re (supra) and Hoskin's Trusts, In re, that where a married woman, or any other person having a general power of appointment over a fund of personality, makes an appointment of the fund by will and appoints an executor, such executor, after he has proved the will, is entitled to receive and give a valid discharge for the appointed fund. Counsel for the defendant did not dispute the authority of these cases, but contended that they only established the proposition that an executor was so entitled, and that an administrator with the will annexed stood in a different position. It was conceded that there was no authority which showed that such an administrator stood in any different position, and I am not aware of any principle which requires any distinction to be made.—p. 327.

KAY, J.—There is another case . . . Harvey v. Harvey, which came before a learned judge very well versed indeed in real property law (Malins, V.-C.) and there the decision was exactly the other way. There the testator had made an appointment under a special power, then he made a will which contained a general clause of revocation, but he did not, according to the judgment of the learned judge, exercise the power; still he held, as I should certainly have held, in the absence of any authority to the contrary, that the words used effected a revocation of the previous testamentary appointment which preceded that will, although the will did not exercise the power by any provision contained in it. The effect was that the property comprised in the power went as in default of appointment, and the will was held to be operative only upon the other property of the testator.—p. 611.

JEUNE, P.—The opinion, indeed, of the delegates in Hughes v. Turner, if correctly reported, would appear to be to the effect that a clause of revocation per se does not revoke so much of an earlier will as purports to execute a power; and in Merritt, In goods of, and Joy, In goods of, Sir C. Cresswell expressed a similar opinion. It might be considered doubtful whether Sotheran v. Dening, in the C. A., overruled those authorities, because weight was given to the consideration which arose in that case, that by virtue of sect. 27. of the Wills Act, a general bequest operated on the subject matter of the power of appointment, and so strengthened the evidence in favour of an intention to revoke its previous execution. But in Kingdon, In re, the question of revocation by a general revocatory clause arose simpliciter, there being no subsequent provision relating to the subject matter of the power in question; and Kay, J., acting on the authority of Sotheran v. Dening, held that a will executing a power was revoked in toto by general words of revocation in a subsequent will. The effect of Kay, J.'s decision is, I venture to think, that on this point of law common sense at last prevailed.—p. 9.

 PORTER, M.R.—It is said, it must be assumed that if a married woman having a power of appointment makes a will, that is only consistent with an intention to exercise the power. Shelford v. Acland is like this case in that respect; for though the M.R. there refers to the Wills Act (1 Vict. c. 26, s. 27), the power being a general one, yet he did not decide the case on that ground, but on the ground that the will must be taken to be an execution of the power, as, if it were not so considered, the words of it would leave nothing to operate upon. That case is not in conflict with Jones v. Tucker ((1817) 2 Meriv. 533, post, col. 2223); Davies v. Thorns ((1849) 2 De G. & Sm. 347, post, col. 2223), and the other cases cited by Mr. Kenny, as they are not cases of wills of married women.—p. 93.

TURNER, L.J.—Great reliance was placed in the course of the argument upon Buckell v. Blenkhorn, but I confess that the reasoning in that case does not to my mind appear so satisfactory as to warrant me in saying that the law upon the point can be considered as settled by it. . . . I do not intimate any opinion as to the correctness of the conclusion come to in that case, but I venture to think that the reasoning upon which the judgment in it is founded is not such as to settle the question so as to bind the Court by that decision, whenever the same question should again arise before it. To assume that a power to appoint by will is the same thing and identical with a power to appoint by "writing" is, in truth, to assume the whole question upon the construction of the Act of Parliament—a question, as it seems to me, of a very doubtful description, having regard to the interpretation clause of the Act.—p. 731.

WESTBURY, L.C.—The difficulty, as is usual, does not arise from any uncertainty as to the principle, but from the reports of conflicting and inconsistent decisions which are now the fruitful cause of litigation. The decision on this point by Wigram, V.-C. in Buckell v. Blenkhorn, followed by the M.R. in Collard v. Sampson, has, I think, been in effect overruled by the L.J. in the latter case, on appeal, and by Wood, V.-C. in West v. Ray (supra). The decision of the M.R. on this point must, therefore, be reversed.—p. 207. See vol. i., col. 1256.

ROMILLY, M.R.—What Sir J. Wigram decided in Buckell v. Blenkhorn was this, that such a power [to appoint by an instrument in writing with formalities] being exercisable by a will with formalities, was a power of appointment by will, and might therefore under the Wills Act be exercised by a will without the formalities. That doctrine has since been shaken.—p. 630.

Palmer v. Locke (1880) 15 Ch. D. 294; 50 L. J. Ch. 113; 43 L. T. 454; 28 W. R. 926.—C.A.

BRETT, L.J.—I should have thought it very dangerous, unless there were some principle very clearly outraged, to overrule the decision of Coffin v. Cooper (supra), which was decided so long ago, and which has probably been acted upon; but I confess that it seems to me that, according to principle, Coffin v. Cooper was right. . . . But I must confess that I agree entirely with the view taken by James, L.J. in Thacker v. Key, that such a covenant as is here in question, and as was in question in Coffin v. Cooper, is a wholly void covenant, and that no remedy could be had upon that covenant against the covenantor (p. 300). . . . As to Davies v. Huguenin (supra), which was referred to in the judgment of Kindersley, V.-C., I confess that as stated by him I have some difficulty in saying that I could entirely agree with what was held in Davies v. Huguenin; but it seems to me that even if Davies v. Huguenin are held to be wrong that would have no effect upon the decision in this case.—p. 302.

COTTON, L.J.—We have the decision of Coffin v. Cooper, before Kindersley, V.-C., carefully considered, where throwing aside what would be pushing the doctrine to an extreme, he gave effect to the appointment, and held it not to be bad. We have also the same point decided in the C. A. in Bulteel v. Plummer.—p. 305.

STIRLING, J.—First, a question was raised as to the meaning of the word "transmissible." I think it means "capable of transmission after death." No clearer illustration of the meaning of the word could be found than in the language of Lord Eldon in Nannock v. Horton, where he spoke of an annuity not being transmissible, but ceasing with the annuitant.—p. 601.

KAY, J.—It is purely a question of intention.
 Did the testator intend to exercise his power?
Bennett v. Aburrow; Denn v. Roake. The intention of a testator can only be inferred from the words of his will, and from the circumstances which, at the time of executing it, were known to him, and which the Court, putting itself in his place, is bound to regard. . . . Doe v. Bird shows that such indications ought to be regarded.

JAMES, L.J.—Notwithstanding . . . Ruding's Settlement, In re—which case, as at present advised, I find it very difficult to distinguish from the present, and if it be necessary to overrule that decision, it must be overruled on the principle I am about to enunciate—I am of opinion that the decision appealed from cannot be sustained. The 24th section of the Wills Act enacts that every will shall be construed with reference to the real and personal estate comprised in it, to speak and take effect as if it had been executed immediately before the death of the testator, unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will: and then the 27th section says, that a general devise or bequest of real or personal estate shall be construed to include any real or personal estate which the testator may have power to appoint in any manner he may think proper, and shall operate as an execution of such power unless a contrary intention shall appear by the will. Taking these two sections together, it is clear that a will containing a general devise or bequest, and made before the creation of a general power to appoint by will, and remaining unrevoked until the testator's death, is a good execution of the power. In fact a general power of appointment really confers on the donee of the power the entire beneficial interest in the property subject to the power, and enables him to dispose of it as he pleases. In Ruding's Settlement, In re, the V.-C. held that the surrounding circumstances could be looked at in construing the will. But when it is said that surrounding circumstances may be looked at, that only means that the circumstances existing at the time when the testator made his will may be looked at. You may place yourself, so to speak, in his armchair, and consider the circumstances by which he was surrounded when he made his will to assist you in arriving at his intention. But to look at a settlement subsequently executed is not to look at the surrounding circumstances which existed when the will was made.—p. 55.

BRETT, L.J.—It appears to me that Thomas v. Jones rightly decided the meaning of the Act of Parliament, and laid down a general rule which should be followed in all cases. I confess I cannot follow the reasoning of the V.-C. in Ruding's Settlement, In re.—p. 56.

BYRNE, J.—It is clear upon the authorities that sect. 27 of the Wills Act applies to general and not to special powers of appointment—see Airey v. Bower, Boyes v. Cook and Esther Williams, in re, Foulkes v. Williams (supra, col. 2224). So far as the reasoning of the V.-C. in Stillman v. Weedon (supra, col. 2224) is founded upon the application of sect. 27 of the Act, such reasoning must be disregarded in view of later decisions. It is also clear that the combined effect of sects. 24 and 27 of the Act is to enable a general power of appointment by will to be well executed by a will executed prior to the date of the instrument creating the power. Unless Stillman v. Weedon is to be read as an authority to the contrary, I have been unable to find any case in which it has been decided that a special power of appointment by will can be well executed by a will dated prior to the creation of the power by virtue of sect. 24 of the Act; and the opinion of Stirling, J. in Wells, in re, Hardisty v. Wells, and the actual decision of the M.R. in Ireland in Doyle v. Coyle, are distinctly opposed to any such conclusion. Stillman v. Weedon may, I think, perhaps be reconciled with the last-mentioned cases either upon the ground that, if specific property, the subject of the power, be referred to in the will, sect. 24 of the Act applies, because that property may then be said to be comprised in the will, or (to use the interpretative words of Turner, L.J. in Langdale (Lady) v. Briggs ((1856) 26 L. J. Ch. 27; 8 De G. M. & G. 391; 2 Jur. (N.S.) 982; 4 W. R. 783), "so far as the will comprises dispositions of real and personal estate" within the meaning of the section, or upon the ground that, independently of the Act, if specific personal property, the subject of the special power, be dealt with by the testator, he must be deemed to have intended to exercise the only power enabling him to deal with it, although such power be created subsequent to the will. I am not certain as to the precise view taken by Lord St. Leonards in Sugden on Powers (8th ed.), p. 307, sect. 49, where he deals with Stillman v. Weedon. Be this as it may, having regard to the opinions of Stirling, J. and of the M.R. in Ireland in the cases I have mentioned, I do not think that I ought to deal with the present case (there being no specific description of or reference to the property in question) upon the footing that, not being within sect. 27, sect. 24 of the Wills Act applies. . . . I should like to mention that in some of the text-books the actual discussion and decision in Stillman v. Weedon has been treated as though it were only in reference to a general power. It is, however, clear to my mind that, rightly or wrongly, the V.-C. considered both sects. 24 and 27 to relate to special powers, and that he was actually dealing with a case of special power.—p. 693.

[Counsel had read, as a comment on Moss v. Harter, the following passage from Sugden on Powers (8th ed. p. 306):—"Where the property is, as in this case, settled by the testator himself upon others, in default of any appointment by him under his power it would seem to require some indication of an intention by him to defeat his settlement in order to hold a general gift in his will, which can be satisfied by other property, to be an execution of his power."]

COTTON, L.J.—With respect to the extract that has been read from Lord St. Leonards' Treatise on Powers, I do not quite understand whether it is a statement of his own opinion, or merely a comment on the effect of Moss v. Harter. But if it is to be taken as an expression of his opinion that, in the case of a power of appointment in a settlement created by the testator himself, an indication of his intention to defeat his settlement must be shown, that appears to me to contradict the words of the statute, and I should hesitate to act, even upon Lord St. Leonards' authority, against the expressed intention of the legislature.—p. 431. THESIGER, L.J. concurred.

JAMES, L.J.—I wish to add, with reference to what has been said by Cotton, L.J., that if Lord St. Leonards is to be understood as saying that the Act is to receive a different interpretation as regards a power in a settlement created by the testator from that which it would receive in other cases, I do not agree with his opinion.—

have had great difficulty in deciding this case if it had been on all fours with that one. But there the gifts were all pecuniary, while here there is a gift of Indian stock, and the case is, therefore, not so strong, though there is an appointment of executors. And in Shelford v. Acland (supra), a doubt is expressed whether the words of the 7 Will. 4 & 1 Vict. c. 27, s. 27, go to the full extent which Stuart, V.-C., seemed to think they did in Hawthorn v. Sheddon. Here I am asked to say that a gift of Indian stock ought to be considered an appointment of a sum of Consolidated Bank Annuities. No doubt, if you describe the fund in a manner applicable to pass it, it will do so, but if you give a sum of 1,000*l.*, that gift will not pass leaseholds.—p. 726.

JESSEL, M.R.—If I entertained a very strong and clear opinion that the decision in Gale v. Gale was erroneous, it is possible that I might make use of the observations of Lord St. Leonards and Malins, V.-C., to aid me in differing from the decision in that case, although it is dated so long ago as the year 1856; but I cannot say that I do entertain such a strong and clear opinion. I should have had very great difficulty in deciding this case if it had come before me unprejudiced by authority; but where I find a case which is in point, and which has got into all the text-books, I am not at liberty to treat it as an authority of no weight. Gale v. Gale is commented upon only in one of the text-books—no doubt a book of very great authority—but in a way which does not apply to the case before me. Lord St. Leonards says of that decision [Sugden on Powers, 8th ed. p. 308]: "This appears to be a narrow construction of the Act." Now, that refers to sect. 23 of the Wills Act. I am by no means prepared to agree that it was a narrow construction. I understand the 23rd section of the Act to refer to an interest remaining in the property, and I see in the note to the last edition of Mr. Shelford's book [Shelford's Real Property Statutes, 8th ed. p. 520] several authorities are quoted which show that that is the meaning of the section. There it is said, "This clause of the Act applies to cases where testators, after having devised their estates, make conveyances of them which are to have the same effect as fines or recoveries, or where they mortgage the devised estates in fee and afterwards take a reconveyance of them to themselves and a trustee to bar dower, but it does not apply to cases where the thing meant to be given is gone." I take it that is the true view of the 23rd section. I can therefore derive no assistance from it as regards this particular testamentary appointment, because here the property is gone.—p. 487. . . . I may mention, and perhaps I should say, that the case before Malins, V.-C. [Johnstone's Settlement, In re] appears, to my mind, to be wholly distinguishable, as I read it, and there was no absolute necessity for him to differ from Gale v. Gale. Whether the V.-C.'s decision can or cannot be supported it is not for me to say.—p. 489.

V. WILLIAMS, L.J.—I think that Blake v. Blake and the other cases decided on the construction of wills purporting to exercise a general power, and the effect of an alteration of the character of the settled property after the making of the will, apply just as much to the exercise of a special power as of a general power. . . . Then come the dicta of Lord Cairns and Lord St. Leonards. I will deal first with the dictum of Lord Cairns in Cooper v. Martin (supra, col. 2230). He said, "I should have had no doubt, speaking with great respect of the contrary view which the V.-C. appears to have entertained, that the appointment of Pain's Hill, eo nomine, in the will would have been a revocation pro tanto of the appointment in the deed of the 5th April previous, and would have carried the proceeds of the sale of Pain's Hill, if, under the trust for pre-emption by the younger brothers or otherwise, it should become necessary to sell it." It will be seen, however, that there the power of appointment was a power to appoint a fund amongst certain of her children in such shares as the donee of the power should by deed or will appoint, of which fund the proceeds of sale of Pain's Hill formed a part. Then, by will, the donee of the power, the testator's widow, appointed the Pain's Hill estate by name to her eldest son. It seems plain from this that Lord Cairns did not mean by the quoted passage to say that, under a power to appoint real estate, an appointment of a specific real estate would carry the proceeds of that estate, if the estate should happen to be sold between the date of the will of the donee of the power and the death of the testator. I do not, therefore, think that the dictum of Lord Cairns assists us in the decision of the present case. Then as to the passage from [Sugden on Powers (8th ed. p. 308)]. He begins by criticising Gale v. Gale, on the ground that it is based on too narrow a construction of sect. 27 of the Wills Act. If he meant that an appointment of a specified real estate would in all cases carry the proceeds, even though invested in the purchase of some other estate, Moor v. Raisbeck ((1841) 12 Sim. 123) would seem to be a clear authority to the contrary, and it is quoted by Mr. Shelford—Real Property Statutes (8th ed. p. 520; 9th ed. p. 421)—as the authority for the passage in his book, which Sir G. Jessel cites with approval in Blake v. Blake. Then follows a passage in which Lord St. Leonards certainly does seem to say as a matter of construction that where property, the subject of the power of appointment, is vested in trustees who have a power of sale, subject to the consent of the donee of the power of appointment, which power they exercise after the date of the will exercising the power of appointment, the appointment would not be defeated by the change in the character of the estate. He says (ch. vii. sect. 7, par. 50): "Supposing a personal fund to be settled on a marriage, in like manner as the real estate was in Gale v. Gale, and there was a power in the settlement to vary the securities, it could hardly be held that an appointment by will, of the fund in its then present state, would be defeated by a variation in the investment of it, under the power for that purpose, subsequently to the will." Sir G. Jessel, in Blake v. Blake, did not agree with this view. He thought that the fact of the sale, being with the consent of the donee of the power, made the sale have the same effect as a sale of his own land would have, and he declined to read the gift of the land as a gift of the proceeds. It is true that both in Gale v. Gale and Blake v. Blake the power of appointment was general, and the sale was with the consent of the donee of the power; and these facts certainly make the case very like the case of a devise of the property of the testator, and a subsequent sale of the same land by the testator. . . . I do not say that Johnstone's Settlement, In re, is bad law. It is not necessary to do so. It does not really touch the present case. That was a case of mere construction, in which the surrounding circumstances were different from those of the present case.—pp. 107—108.

ROMER, L.J.—The reasoning of Sir G. Jessel, M.R., in Blake v. Blake, where he deals with Gale v. Gale, though those were cases of general powers, appears to me to apply to the present case, and with reference to the criticism on Gale v. Gale by Lord St. Leonards in his work on Powers, I may observe that he himself relies on the intention of the testator. He says (8th ed. p. 308), "The testator did not intend his legatees to take the settled estate itself, but the produce of it, and that was precisely the condition in which the settled property stood at his death." But that was begging the whole question. If the intention of the testator was to appoint the proceeds of the sale of the estate, I know of no reason why that intention should not be given effect to. But of course that intention must appear from the will itself, regard of course being had to the instrument creating the power, so that again one is brought back to the point as to whether from the will you can gather that the testator has appointed the proceeds. No doubt, in many cases, though an appointment may be of a property by a particular description, there may be sufficient in the will to show that the testator meant to appoint, and has really appointed, whatever represented that property at the time of his death. It is, in my opinion, only on this ground, if at all, that the decision of Malins, V.-C. in Johnstone's Settlement, In re, can be supported, and this was, I think, the ground on which Willet v. Finlay was decided. In that case the power was to appoint by will a settled fund of 1,000*l.*, which was at the date of the will invested on loan to a Mr. Fitzpatrick on mortgage. The will, which was of an informal character, appointed the 1,000*l.* by the description of "the 1,000*l.* Mr. Fitzpatrick has," and I gather that the Court in effect held that the intention sufficiently appeared to appoint the 1,000*l.* as a fund, and that the reference to Mr. Fitzpatrick was descriptive only of the then condition of the fund, and that it was not in essence merely an appointment of a debt, which would prima facie be adeemed by being paid off. With regard to the observation of Lord Cairns in Cooper v. Martin, which is of course of great weight, I think it is fully explained by the fact that the power there was in terms to appoint the proceeds of sale of an estate devised in trust for sale, and an appointment of the estate under such a power could only operate on the estate through the proceeds. Lastly, I may say that I agree with the excellent judgment of Farwell, J. in Dowsett, In re.—p. 109.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—I put aside cases where a testator has exercised a general power, such as Gale v. Gale and Blake v. Blake. They may be considered as equivalent to dispositions of a man's own property, and therefore distinguishable. . . . No general principle was laid down by Lord Cairns [in Cooper v. Martin]. So far as I am aware, the precise question has never arisen for decision until the recent case of Dowsett, In re, where Farwell, J. decided that, for the purposes of ademption, there was no difference between a special and a general power, and that the doctrine applies to both alike. I agree with Farwell, J.'s view, which seems to me to be consistent with general principles.—p. 111.

PEARSON, J.—I start . . . with the proposition that the testator undoubtedly meant to exercise whatever power he had. It is said that the word "beneficial" limits the exercise, and no doubt Mr. Cozens-Hardy is quite right in saying that, in Ames v. Cadogan, Fry, J. did put such a construction upon the word "beneficial." I do not wish to shrink from a case which seems to stand in my way, and to show that the word "beneficial" means beneficial to the person exercising the power. With all respect to that very learned judge I confess that I am not disposed to think that you can limit the word "beneficial" in every case in that way. I am far from thinking or suggesting that he was not perfectly right in so limiting the word in that case, and if his observations had been limited to the construction of the word "beneficial" in that particular will, I do not know that any doubt could have been raised as to his dietum, and the only doubt which I venture to hazard as to the correctness of the opinion of so learned a judge is this, that the word "beneficial" need not always necessarily have that meaning. To my mind the use of the word "beneficial" in our language is exceedingly inaccurate, and I think it is as frequently used in the active as in the reflective sense.—p. 180.

STIRLING, J.—The rule applicable to cases of this sort is thus stated by Pearson, J., in Von Brockdorff v. Malcolm, in a passage cited with approval by North, J., in Cotton, In re (supra): "The simple question is, whether I can find in the will itself such an indication of an intention to exercise the power as that I ought to hold that the power has been exercised. It is a question of intention, and a question of intention only. There being various indications in the will, some one way, and some the other, the question I have to decide as well as I can is, on which side does the balance weigh most strongly? When you have put the one against the other, to which side ought you rather to incline in order to determine what is the real truth of the case with regard to the intention of a man of whose intention you know nothing except what you find in his will?"—p. 257.

MALINS, V.-C.—What I decided in Ferrier v. Jay was, that where there was a general and special power, and an appointment was made of both funds together to trustees in trust to pay debts and to apply the residue for the objects of the special power, the appointment must be read reddendo singula singulis, and the fund coming under the general power applied in the first instance to the purposes to which the fund subject to the special power was not applicable. I agreed with the decision in Cowx v. Foster, that the circumstance of directing debts to be paid only meant that they were to be paid out of the particular portion of the mixed fund which could be so applied. I did also in that case undoubtedly say that the second trustees were the most fit persons to have charge of the fund; but I did not say that where it was a mere question which of two sets of trustees should hold a particular fund, the Court would necessarily hand it over to the second set in point of date.—p. 20.

NORTH, J.—There were two recent cases cited . . . Ferrier v. Jay and Busk v. Aldam. Now, as regards the first case, there were two points; one was whether a general gift of all the real and personal estate which the testatrix had power to appoint to trustees to pay debts, and then to divide the residue between the objects of a special power, passed to persons who were objects of the special power, and it was held that it did, following Cowx v. Foster. A second point was raised by the special case there, namely, who in that case were the proper trustees to hold the fund for the objects in whose favour the appointment was exercised beneficially. There were two sets of trustees, the trustees of the original will, and the trustees of the will exercising the power. The case was a special case. Nothing was said against the competency of either set of trustees; but inasmuch as there was a question which of the two sets of trustees ought to hold the fund, the question was put to the Court: Who were the trustees to carry out the trust of the appointed fund? The point was submitted. It was not argued. Neither side wished to hold the fund, but would rather leave it to the other, and all that was required was, that a direction of the Court should be given who should have the fund. The V.-C. said: "Upon the question as to which trustees are to carry out the trusts of the appointed fund, I must again follow the decision in Cowx v. Foster, and direct that the trustees of Mary Ferrier's will are the proper persons." Now as regards that, the point did not arise in Cowx v. Foster. There were not two sets of trustees in that case. It was not following that case to say that the trustees of the second will should have the fund. In Busk v. Aldam, Malins, V.-C., referring to Ferrier v. Jay, said: "I did also in that case undoubtedly say that the second trustees were the most fit persons to have charge of the fund." But the V.-C. there was under a misapprehension. That was not what he had said, and he put it on a case which did not decide the point. It was simply a question which set of trustees should hold the fund. Neither set of trustees cared so long as they were told by the authority of the judge which it ought to be, either one set or the other. That, therefore, is not a decision which assists me in any way on this occasion.—p. 544.

COTTON, L.J.—North, J. decided this case on this ground, that the trustees appointed by Mrs. Sowden were entitled as a matter of law to receive the fund from the trustees of the original settlement, and, under the power given by Mrs. Sowden's will, to give a good receipt for it. I do not think it necessary, under the circumstances of this case, to decide that question. Certainly, I express no opinion in any way at variance with what is possibly the only decision on that point, namely, Busk v. Aldam, which was before Malins, V.-C.—p. 386.

KEKEWICH, J.—Busk v. Aldam only comes to this, that where an appointment of a fund has been made under a power in a settlement to the trustees of another settlement for the benefit of children taking under that settlement, such children being objects of the power, it does not follow as a matter of course that the trustees of the subsidiary settlement are entitled to receive the fund from the trustees of the original settlement, but that the trustees of that settlement are bound to retain the fund and make the distribution themselves; and that the question who are the parties to distribute the fund depends upon the intention of the instrument creating the power; and if you find that there is an intention that the trustees of that instrument shall distribute the fund, that intention shall prevail.—p. 153. STIRLING, J.—It is stated, and for the present purpose I assume, that this power was the only testamentary power to which the testatrix was entitled. This is a circumstance which has in many cases been held to afford evidence of considerable cogency of an intention to exercise such a power; see Pidgely v. Pidgely (supra, col. 2228), Banks v. Banks (supra, col. 2235), Teape's Trusts, In re (post, col. 2239), and Swinburne, In re (supra, col. 2221). It was contended that evidence of the fact was inadmissible, regard being had to the decisions in Mills, In re (supra, col. 2224), Williams, In re (supra, col. 2224), and Huddleston, In re (supra, col. 2224), but all of them are directed to a different point, and were not intended, so far as I can see, to overrule the series of cases just referred to, not one of which is mentioned in the judgments of any one of the learned judges by whom those decisions were given. . . . I may state, however, that where a will is found containing a general expression of intention to execute any disposing power to which the testator may be entitled, the Court has repeatedly refused to infer the contrary intention from such circumstances as a direction to pay debts or funeral expenses, or legacies, or bequests in favour of persons not objects of the power. As to this, in addition to the cases already mentioned, I may cite Cowx v. Foster, Errier v. Jay, Thornton v. Thornton, and Price v. Price. Cotton, In re (supra, col. 2222), is the strongest case in which, in recent times at all events, the contrary intention has been held to be sufficiently indicated.—p. 257.

FARWELL, J.—My only ground for hesitation is an expression of opinion by Chatterton, V.-C., in Richardson's Trusts, In re. It is not a decision on the point. The words of disposition in that case were, "I give, devise, bequeath, and appoint," and the testatrix had a general power. Chatterton, V.-C., held that the word "appoint" was satisfied by applying it to the general power, but in the course of his judgment he said: "The argument on one side turns only on the use of the word appoint; that on the other, on the insufficiency of this without more to indicate the intention, and also on the description of the subject of gift as 'all my real and personal estate and effects of every kind.' Property which was not that of the testatrix, but over which she had a special power of appointment, cannot, without the aid of a strong context, be held to be described by these words. No such context exists here except merely the word 'appoint'; and even if the testatrix had no general power of appointment, I think that I should go beyond any decided cases, and beyond the principle on which those cases proceed, if I were to hold that this was sufficient." This dictum should probably be read with reference to the will before Chatterton, V.-C. If it was intended as a general dictum, so as to be applicable to the will before me, I respectfully dissent from it. In the present case I think the context shows that the word "appoint" refers to the special power, which is therefore duly exercised.—p. 680.

CHITTY, J.—Where under a like power [to appoint a definite fund among special objects] several sums are appointed by successive independent deeds, there prima facie the sums or parts appointed, not being aliquot parts, have priority according to the dates of the deeds. This principle was acted upon by Hall, V.-C. in Stokes v. Bridgman, and by Knight Bruce, V.-C. in Trollope v. Routledge; and it was assumed in Eales v. Drake by Jessel, M.R.; who, in his judgment, speaks of the fund over which the power subsisted as being only 7,000*l.*, treating the 3,000*l.* appointed by the prior deed as unquestionably having priority over the 7,000*l.*, the residue of the original 10,000*l.*—p. 662.

KEKEWICH, J.—In Trollope v. Routledge . . . there had been considerable argument and many points raised respecting appointments, and when they were all settled counsel for one of the incumbancers contended that, as there was a fair question raised by the language of the deeds, the costs ought to come out of the unappointed par of the fund, by analogy to the case of a will, where the costs arising from difficulties of construction fall upon the residuary estate. That was the sole point raised. Here you have a dispute about an appointed fund. Part of it remains unappointed and therefore must be treated as if it were residue of an estate. The V.-C. said that, as he believed, the rule had not been applied to appointments, and directed the costs to be apportioned according to the amounts of the appointed and unappointed parts of the fund, and to be borne by those parts respectively according to their amounts. He simply did not apply the rule prevailing in the administration of estates which he was asked to apply. . . . That helps me very little. The V.-C. considered that that was an equitable way of distributing the costs, but I do not think that he lays down any rule. . . . In the case [Moore v. Dixon] there was a usual power of appointment and exercised in favour of children unequally, but the hotchpot clause came in, and so there was not very much difference in the result. Then there was an action to administer the trusts of the settlement—that was an administration expense purely—and the V.-C. was asked to determine, and he gave some care to the determination of the question of how those costs were to be borne, and he decided that they were to be borne rateably by all the funds. He not only decides it, but he certainly treats himself as deciding it, on authority, including Trollope v. Routledge. He is referring to that case when he says, "That is, therefore, a clear decision on the subject, and it seems to have been followed ever since, and to have become an established rule." I have reasons for doubting whether it can be regarded as a clear decision on the subject, but Malins, V.-C. treated it so, and said that it had "become an established rule." . . . Then the matter came before North, J. in another form in Shaw, In re. There there was estate duty, or rather account duty, and there were successive appointments of a specific amount, and then the residue appointed by will. Questions arose there as to the account duty. The learned judge decided that the costs should be borne rateably. There again he did not decide it as a question in his discretion at all. Trollope v. Routledge was cited to him, and not referred to in his judgment; but he says at the end: "But I am very glad to find that there is authority that the costs should be borne rateably." He, therefore, seems to have agreed with Malins, V.-C. that that was an authority on the point; and notwithstanding what occurs to me, looking at Trollope v. Routledge, when I find two learned judges saying that it is an authority, I think it must be regarded as such; and if it were not an authority at the moment it was made so by their adoption. Then in Saunders, In re, Chitty, L.J. certainly states the general rule in perfectly clear terms: "In the case of an appointment, if there are no words to the contrary,"—he is distinguishing appointment from legacy—"all the appointees have, according to the general rule, to bear rateably the expenses of the trustees in relation to the administration of the fund, including its distribution."—pp. 292, 293.

CRANWORTH, L.C.—At the conclusion of the argument I expressed myself as concurring in the view taken by the V.-C. of the general rule as established by the authorities, to the effect that prima facie an appointee is presumed to take a share in the unappointed fund. That is laid down in Wilson v. Piggott, and clearly elucidated by the M.R. in Wombwell v. Hanrott.—p. 66.

KAY, J.—It is clear that an appointment before the Wills Act, although purporting to be by will, if not made with the formalities then required to make a perfect will, and not made with the formalities required by the terms of the power, would yet be aided in equity, if it were in favour of a child. For that I need only refer to Wilkes v. Holmes, and the later case of Lucena v. Lucena (p. 379). . . . I must read this decision [Kennard v. Kennard] as meaning not that the memorandum being considered to be a testamentary document was in equity turned into a deed, but that the Court did not consider that the document was testamentary, but treated it as a mere memorandum, which might, by aid of the Court of equity, be turned into a deed, by supplying the defective execution.—p. 380.

KEKEWICH, J.—The document . . . is, I will assume, . . . a valid will according to the law of France; but it is not a will that could, under the provisions of the Wills Act, be proved in this country. The question is, can it operate as an exercise of a general power of appointment by will? As to that the decision of Kay, J., Kirwan's Trusts, In re, is conclusive that it cannot, even if it had been a will that could be admitted to probate in this country under the Wills Act, 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 114). Is that decision inconsistent with D'Huart v. Harkness, where Sir J. Romilly, M.R., decided that a power to appoint "by a will duly executed" is well exercised by a will good according to the law of the country of the domicile of the donee of the power, though ill executed according to the law of England? That case, as already mentioned, was not referred to in Kirwan's Trusts, In re, but the latter is cited in a note on p. 308 of Wms. on Executors, vol. i. (9th ed.) as the authority for the proposition that in the case of a will which is only valid by reason of the Wills Act, 1861, sects. 9 and 10 of the Wills Act, 1837, must be complied with. That appears to me to form the distinction between the two cases.—p. 364.

BYRNE, J.—The provisions of ss. 9 and 10 of the Wills Act, 1837, have no application to wills of persons not domiciled in England. This was decided by Stirling, J. in Price, In re, where he cites Dicey's Conflict of Laws, p. 684, and Bremer v. Freeman (1857) 10 Moore P. C. 306, 359; and although in that case Stirling, J. does not, I think, agree with what was said by Kay, J. in Kirwan's Trusts, In re, in reference to the application of the negative words in sect. 10 of the Wills Act to the case before him, he at the same time points out that the decision in Kirwan's Trusts, In re, may be rested on three grounds—"First, the power was required to be executed by an instrument in a special form which the instrument said to be an execution of the power did not satisfy. Secondly, the Wills Act had no application, inasmuch as the testator was domiciled abroad; and although the instrument was not invalidated by the prohibitory portion of sect. 10, it did not derive validity from the enabling portion of that section. In any case the instrument did not satisfy the requirements of the Wills Act. Thirdly, although the instrument was valid by Lord Kingsdown's Act, still, as was pointed out by Kay, J., that statute does not contain any enactment dealing with wills made in exercise of powers." The power is not framed as in D'Huart v. Harkness, so as to be exercisable by the donee by his last will and testament "in writing duly executed," but requires execution with special formalities which have not been observed. . . . It appears to me that following the reasoning of Stirling, J. . . . and of Kay, J., in Kirwan's Trusts, In re, apart from the special point in which Stirling, J. does not agree with it, I must hold in the case of the donee being a foreigner, that it is not enough where special formalities are required by the instrument creating the power that the instrument should be a will according to the law of domicile, but that in cases where the provisions of the Wills Act do not apply such will must comply with the terms of the power.—p. 606.

COTTENHAM, L.C.—The equality adopted by the Court is confined to the unappointed fund: it is acting on the general intent as to such fund, to benefit the different clauses, the particular object of selection amongst them being defeated by the non-execution of the power. This is precisely what occurred in Maddison v. Andrew where there had been a valid, but an unequal appointment of a part of the fund, and as to another part there was an invalid appointment to another party. Lord HARDYCKE said the unappointed fund should be equally divided amongst the objects of the appointment, without regard to the share they had received from the valid appointment. Many cases establishing the same rule are referred to by Sir E. Sugden, in his second volume on Powers, 238.—p. 189.

SIR B. PEACOCK.—In Sugden on Powers it is said, "In many cases an exclusive appointment may be authorised by the apparent intention of the donor, although no words of exclusion are expressly used. Thus, he says, in Bevil v. Rich, the testator gave all the rest of his estate to A. B. in trust, 'to give my children and grandchildren according to their demerits.' A. B. gave the estate to one, excluding the rest. Lord Nottingham refused to set aside the appointment, as the children were to come in by the act of the devisee, and he was to give or distribute according to their demerits, therefore he was to judge." So in the present case John was charged with the fiduciary substitution and was to decide.—p. 661.

JESSEL, M.R.—Mr. Farwell [Farwell on

Powers, p. 294] says: "Each case must depend on the intention expressed in the particular instrument creating the power; no general rule can be laid down, except perhaps that the words 'all and every' are mandatory, and make it necessary that each object should have a share [5 Ves. 857], and that 'such' authorises exclusion, unless a contrary intention appear." I have doubt that is the law.—p. 64. . . . With regard to Garthwaite v. Robinson, decided by Shadwell, V.-C., I must confess that I should not have decided that case in the same way that he did. It was decided as a pure and simple question of the construction of a will. The will there was different from the will now before me, and no general rule of law was laid down. I must say that the V.-C. came to the conclusion he did for reasons which I am unable to appreciate. It cannot be expected that the minds of any two judges will always adopt the same view of the construction of particular words used by a testator, and therefore a decision on the mere meaning of such words is of little value. Words which strike one mind as of great importance do not strike another mind in the same way, and possibly the V.-C. attached greater weight to particular words than I should have done. In that case the power was to appoint among the testator's "present or future grandchildren or their respective issue," and the V.-C. held that the power had been badly executed on account of the exclusion of the children of a deceased grandchild, who were living at the donee's death. I should be entirely unable, on that will, to arrive at that conclusion, and if I had to construe the same words I should feel myself at liberty, according to the rule laid down by the H. L. in Jenkins v. Hughes (1860) 8 H. L. C. 571—that one judge is not bound to follow the decisions of another on questions of mere verbal interpretation—to decline following the decision. Moreover, the point as to the effect of a power to appoint among issue indefinitely was not argued. The other case which was cited, Stolworthy v. Saneroff, before Kindersley, V.-C., requires more serious consideration; for, first, the case is more like this, and, secondly, a similar point was argued. Whether or not I should have arrived at the same conclusion as the V.-C. I cannot say, but the point was not quite missed at all events. There the testator gave an estate to trustees in trust for A. for life, and after her decease, "in case she should leave issue, upon trust to dispose of his said estate in such manner, amongst such issue," as A. should by deed or will appoint, and it was held that an appointment by A. among some only of her issue living at her death was bad. Now the peculiarity of that case was that the power was to be exercised by A. "in case she should leave issue." It therefore involved the absurdity that the power could not be exercised except upon her death. And if "issue" meant issue indefinitely, it involved the further absurdity that the donee, if the power was non-exclusive, was bound to appoint to issue born after her death. But, even supposing the objects of the power were restricted to issue born in the lifetime of the donee, how could she ascertain while in articulo mortis how many grandchildren or great-grandchildren she had at that moment, and then exercise her power? for if the power was non-exclusive, she must have appointed to every one of her issue who might be living at the actual moment of her death. But these considerations were not pressed on the V.-C. He says, in his judgment, "It is contended that if the objects of the power are confined to issue living at the death, it was absurd to give a power by deed as well as by will, because if there was a partial exercise of the power by deed in favour of one object, raising the question of exclusive appointment in the lifetime of the donee, then, if that person died before the donee, the appointment would fail, as that person would not be an object of the power. I agree in the justice of that observation, but I am at a loss to see why that is more absurd than that the power was not to arise unless she left issue living at her death." That is, the V.-C. gets rid of one absurdity by showing another absurdity; but that is no answer. I cannot regard that case as an authority for the construction of the particular instrument before me, which differs in form from that before the V.-C. No general law was there laid down, unless it was this, that whenever a testator is so absurd as to give a power of appointment in case the donee of the power leaves issue, to be exercised in favour of such issue, the power must be considered as a non-exclusive power exercisable in favour of every one of the issue which may happen to be in existence at the death of the donee.—p. 68.

HALL, V.-C.—Then as to the question whether the power of appointment is an exclusive one or not. . . . I will do what the M.R., in Veale's Trusts, In re, said was the proper thing to do: try to find out the meaning of the words according to their ordinary use. . . . Here the form is "for such child," in the singular, "or children," not "and children," as was the case in Swift v. Gregson, in which, although the words were "such child and children," the Court held that the power was exclusive. It was stated that the decision there had been questioned by Lord St. Leonards [Sugden on Powers (8th ed., pp. 445, 446)]. If it has been it may be distinguished, because the conjunctive "and" was used, and it may be said that the donee of the power was not entitled to choose one child out of many. But there is that decision before me, and according to the ordinary and fair construction of the words, I consider that the case is in itself quite enough to lead me, and indeed to require me, to hold that this is an exclusive power. I may just refer to the cases as classified by Mr. Farwell, and say that the classification has been accepted and adopted by the M.R., and that I am very willing to recognise and adopt it as well.—p. 634.

object, is not valid under the Illusory Appointments Act (11 Geo. 4 & 1 Will. 4. c. 46).]

SIR B. PEACOCK for the Court.—The Courts in Lower Canada are not bound by the current of decisions in England, as the Judges in England before 1874, and Lord Alvanley in *Kemp v. Even in England those decisions had caused so much inconvenience that it was found necessary to resort to legislation upon the subject, and the law was amended by Act 37 & 38 Vict. c. 37.—p. 662.

JESSEL, M.R.—Alexander v. Alexander is not quite in point. There were various questions in that case, but the actual decision was, that under the particular circumstances, the son was entitled to the whole of the appointed fund. Sir T. Clarke read the will as if the words were, "to my son Francis and his wife and children, if they shall by law be capable." In saying that the reasoning was "very artificial" and "not satisfactory," Lord St. Leonards [Sugden on Powers (8th ed., pp. 504, 505)] means to say it was unsound reasoning, and I agree with him. The M.R. had no right to put into the will the words he did. The decision in effect was, that although there was no possibility of ascertaining what shares the appointees were intended to take, yet the one object of the power took the whole. That decision has been overruled by later authorities [Oswald interposed this observation:—But Sir T. Clarke expressly follows the principle laid down in Humphrey v. Tayleur, Ambl. 136.] What he says in Alexander v. Alexander is a mere dictum, and it is difficult to support a dictum when the decision is gone. With great deference to Sir T. Clarke, I do not see what Humphrey v. Tayleur had to do with the case before him. Humphrey v. Tayleur does not appear to have been decided on general law, but on the words of the codicil. Lord Hardwicke treats the codicil as if it had the effect of erasing the name of one of the original appointees.—p. 602.

BYRNE, J.—I am asked to say that it [Hodgson v. Halford] is inconsistent with the authority of D'Abbadie v. Halford, and I consider that the latter case is an authority which I ought to follow. Accordingly I hold that this is not a case of a fraud on the power.—p. 617.

TURNER, L.J.—In that case [Scroggs v. Scroggs] the consent of a trustee was necessary to the exercise of a power, and the donee of the power procured the trustee's consent by a false representation, to which the appointee does not appear to have been in any way a party; yet the Court set aside the appointment (p. 570). . . . His honour [in the Court below] however has held this appointment to be bad as to the whole of the 16,000*l.* upon the general rule, that where an appointment is made for a bad purpose, the bad purpose affects the whole appointment, and his honour has relied upon Daubeny v. Cockburn in support of this view. That this general rule is correct when applied to cases in which the evidence does not enable the Court to distinguish what is attributable to an authorised from what is attributable to an unauthorised purpose, I feel no doubt; but if the evidence enables the Court to make this distinction, the foundation on which the rule rests, the impossibility of distinguishing what is attributable to one purpose from what is attributable to another, wholly fails; and the general rule therefore cannot, as it seems to me, apply. Sir W. Grant has, I think, in Daubeny v. Cockburn, pointed to this view; for he said that he could not collect from the evidence, that but for the assent of the daughter, any appointment would have been executed in her favour.—p. 571. ROMILLY, M.R.—Turner, L.J. lately in *Topham v. KEKEWICH, J.—I have nothing to do with motives; they are a dangerous subject with which to treat at all. But I am entitled to look at the purpose, the intention with which a deed is executed. That is the foundation of the judgment of Turner, L.J. in Topham v. Portland (Duke), which is exhaustive of the whole of this branch of law. You look not at the motive, but at the intention. If you find that the intention or the purpose is fraudulent, that is to say, not honestly in exercise of the power, then you will set aside that exercise, because it is not honest, that is to say, not according to the intention of the parties.—p. 658.

was decided both by James, V.-C. and the C. A.
on similar grounds. As was observed by Lord Hatherley in the course of his judgment, a former appointment had been set aside on the ground that the appointee was a mere instrument for effecting the purpose of the donee of the power, which was foreign to that which was the true purpose of the power, and that while he gave implicit credence to the statements of both the appointor and appointee that the absolute appointment in favour of the latter had been made without any agreement between them, he inferred from all the evidence before him, and particularly from that of the appointee herself, that she was still under the same influence, and would still be a passive instrument to effect the purposes of the appointor.—p. 442.

JAMES, L.J.—It has been decided in various

it is fiduciary only to this extent, that the donee

ROMILLY, M.R.—To hold the deed to be void would be what I fear is too much the tendency of technical rules; it would be to strain a rule, intended for the purpose of benefiting the objects of the power, to a rigid exactness which inflicts a plain and manifest injury on them. This appears to me to be the evil attempted to be avoided by Lord Eldon in M'Queen v. Farquhar, and also in Cockcroft v. Sutcliffe, which is a still stronger case, and which appears to me to be a most valuable decision. There a tenant for life with a power of appointment among his children appointed to two of them, and then joined with them in a mortgage, the money being expressed to be advanced to all three, and it was held by Lord Hatherley, then Wood, V.-C., that this was no fraud on the power of appointment. I adopt that case in its fullest extent. The meaning and the good sense of the rule appear to be that if the appointor either directly or indirectly obtains any exclusive advantage for himself, and that to obtain this advantage is the object and the reason of its being made, then the appointment is bad; but that if the whole transaction taken together shows no such object, but only shows an intention to improve the whole subject-matter of the appointment for the benefit of all the objects of the power, then the exercise of the power is not fraudulent or void, although by the force of circumstances such improvement cannot be bestowed on the property which is the subject of the appointment without the appointor to some extent participating therein.—p. 566.

ROMILLY, M.R.—It is obvious that *Tucker v.
Sanger* must have created considerable difference of opinion, for we find the L.C.B. afterwards insisting on the correctness of the decision, which he would not have done, unless it had been questioned. Lord St. Leonards (2 Sug. Powers, 282) considered the case as one of great difficulty, having regard to the earlier cases. Looking at the cases which Alexander, C.B. considered as stronger than and fully warranting his decision, viz., Routledge v. Dorvil (col. 2265), and that class, they simply lay down the proposition, that when the donee of a power intends to appoint and the appointee intends to settle the property, the whole may be effected by one deed or one instrument, and the appointment and settlement may be made simultaneously; but if the reason of the appointment being made to the appointee arises from a previous contract with the donee of the power to appoint to persons, not objects of the power, I find no previous case which amounts to a decision that such an appointment can be supported in this Court. . . . I do not therefore consider Tucker v. Sanger as altering the law on this subject, it is a mere question of evidence. But if it is contended that that case establishes the proposition, that no bargain between the appointee and the donee of a power, by which the appointee gets the absolute appointment by agreement with the appointor, for the purpose of providing for persons not objects of the power, and to whom the donee could not have given it directly, is invalid, provided no direct pecuniary benefit arises to the donee, then I dissent from this view of the law: but I do not understand that any such proposition is intended to be established by the L.C.B. in that case.—pp. 307, 308.

NORTH, J.—In Marsden's Trust, In re, the facts were very peculiar, and it has been treated by other judges as a somewhat exceptional case, and I think it is so for this reason. There a mother, who had under a settlement a power of appointment among children, desired to make a provision for the father out of the settled fund, his circumstances being such that she thought he ought to be assisted in that way. This intention was openly discussed. The father was not an object of the power, and therefore he could not take any part of the settled fund under an appointment. A solicitor was consulted, and he advised that an appointment could not be made to the father, and that project thereupon dropped. An arrangement was then made between the father and the mother that the whole fund should be appointed by the mother to the eldest child, a daughter, who was at that time an infant, and who did not require any immediate provision to be made for her, with this object, that, when the mother was dead, the father might tell the daughter that the whole fund had been appointed to her, under an arrangement between her father and mother, with the object of enabling the daughter to provide for her father. One cannot help seeing what an influence would have been brought to bear on the daughter when the father told her that, and that it would be practically impossible that she should resist doing that which it was the intention of her father and mother that she should do, and the doing of which under the influence thus exercised upon her would be an entire perversion and misapplication of the fund—taking it away from the persons in whose favour it ought to have been appointed, and giving it to a stranger. If an appointment of that kind is obtained by means of undue influence, of course it cannot stand, and that is shown by the later cases which have been referred to. That, I think, is the true explanation of Marsden's Trust, In re, and I do not think that case is in any way inconsistent with the law as stated in Pryor v. Pryor (2 De G. J. & S. 205, post, col. 2259). The same conclusion is, I think, to be drawn from Roach v. Trood (supra).—p. 626.

JESSEL, M.R.—Now when a rule of law which is against principle is alleged to be established, there are two points to be considered, first of all, was any such rule of law ever laid down by any judge? That is the first point to be decided; and secondly, if it was so laid down, has it passed into a binding rule of law?—that is, has it been so recognised and dealt with by subsequent judges as to prevent a judge of a tribunal of co-ordinate jurisdiction from saying that the decision is contrary to the course of law, and is not binding upon him? As regards the first point, as I have already said, if I look at Hinchinbroke (Lord) v. Seymour as reported, I cannot find that any such rule of law as is alleged was laid down in it. I now go to another point. Did Lord Thurlow ever decide Hinchinbroke (Lord) v. Seymour in the way appearing in the report? I have come to the conclusion that he did not: that the report is an imperfect and incorrect report, and that the real point decided was that the appointment was in fraud of the power. There is evidence as to this which, to my mind, is quite satisfactory, though I am bound to admit that judges have differed in opinion as to the ground on which the case was decided. In the first place, I must state what the case was, for I sent for the record and read it (p. 340). . . . Now as to the evidence which has satisfied me as to the ground of the decision. The first thing is the statement by Lord Eldon in M. Queen v. Farquhar (supra, col. 2254). In 1784, when Hinchinbroke (Lord) v. Seymour was decided, Lord Eldon was at the Chancery bar, and I may mention that there were very few gentlemen practising at the Chancery bar in those days, and very few causes in which they could practise. . . . I sent for a law list to see whether Sir Anthony Hart was at the bar at that time, and I found, rather to my surprise, that the whole bar of England in 1783 (there is no list for 1784) was under 300, practising and non-practising, and therefore one may imagine the small number there were at the Chancery bar, and how very unlikely it is that Lord Eldon had not personal knowledge of what occurred. I am satisfied that he had, and that when he states what occurred he states it of his own knowledge. That being so, he tells us this, at p. 479: "It is truly said, this Court will not permit a party to execute a power for his own benefit. In Lord Sandwich's Case" (Lord Hinchinbroke became Lord Sandwich in 1792, and consequently Lord Eldon in 1805 correctly speaks of him as Lord Sandwich) "a father having a power of appointment, and thinking one of his children was in consumption, appointed in favour of that child. And the Court was of opinion that the purpose was to take the chance of getting the money as administrator of that child." Speaking for myself, I prefer Lord Eldon's statement in 1805 as to what the judgment of Lord Thurlow was, to a report in Brown, if I must choose between the two. But Lord Eldon mentioned it again in the Queensberry Case. . . . Therefore we have Lord Eldon for the second time stating that the decision was that the appointment was a fraud on the power, and stating in particular that the child was in a consumption. In the first case he said that the father thought so, and in the second case he said that it was so (p. 343). [The M.R. then discussed Edgeworth v. Edgeworth, in which a different view of Hinchinbroke (Lord) v. Seymour was taken, and continued:] I shall not read the passages on the subject in his [Lord St. Leonards'] book on Powers. They are not as distinct as might be, but if he had said nothing else on the subject I should have thought, notwithstanding a note to one of the passages, that he took the view that Brown's report was correct, and that the case was decided upon some general principle applicable to powers and not on the ground of the fraud on the power. But we have a case before him which is twice reported, Keily v. Keily. I would mention that where there is a distinction between those reports I always prefer Connor and Lawson. There is no substantial distinction between them in this case, though there is a slight difference. We have here a very carefully considered judgment, in which Lord St. Leonards states his view of Hinchinbroke (Lord) v. Seymour in clear, distinct, and unmistakable terms; and of course an opinion given in a judgment after argument is to be preferred to a note in a text-book. In both reports he distinctly treats the case as decided on the ground that the appointment was a fraud on the power. . . . Lord Hatherley there [Wellesley v. Mornington (Earl) (supra)] considers the case and states that Lord Thurlow does not put his decision upon the ground of fraud. He therefore thought that the report of Lord Thurlow's judgment in Brown was right. It does not appear that his attention was called to the Queensberry Case, and all I can say is that he adopts the view of Sir Anthony Hart and does not adopt the view of Lord St. Leonards, if Keily v. Keily was called to his attention, which I do not think that it was.—p. 347. [His lordship then referred to Chance on Powers, p. 141, pl. 369, and p. 463, pl. 1298, and Farwell on Powers, p. 326, and pointed out that Hinchinbroke (Lord) v. Seymour was by both authors treated as decided on the ground of fraud in the exercise of the power.]

FRY, L.J. (for self and BOWEN, L.J.).—It appears to us to be plain that the mere conferring of a benefit upon a person not an object of the power will not avoid the exercise of the power, if made with the approbation of the real objects of the power: see Sugden on Powers [8th ed. p. 670]; or even if made with the approval of the person who would take under an exercise in favour of the object of the power, as in the case where an appointment was made to a married daughter, and she and her husband re-settled it, giving benefits, not only to their children, but to a stranger to the family: Wright v. Goff; or where the appointment was made upon the usual terms of a marriage settlement on the occasion of the marriage of an infant daughter: Fitzroy v. Richmond (Duke) (supra). It appears to us to be further plain that the mere existence of an antecedent contract between the donee of the power and the appointee for a re-settlement conferring benefits on a stranger is not enough to invalidate the appointment. In Langston v. Blackmore (Ambl. 288, supra, col. 2258), decided by Lord Hardwicke in 1755, there was a distinct bargain between the father and the eldest son as to the whole transaction, the eldest son agreeing to pay 80*l.* to his father, and 50*l.* to a younger brother, and the father giving up a life-interest in a moiety of the property which was then appointed by the father upon the usual trusts of a marriage settlement on his eldest son: and in like manner in the recent case of Roach v. Trood there was a bargain in fact between the father and the son, acceded to by the son before the appointment could take effect. Again, in Cooper v. Cooper James, V.-C. said: "Taking the whole thing together the bargain is this: 'I will appoint to you 5,000*l.* out of the settled fund, provided you will enter into a bargain with me that if I pay down directly 5,000*l.* more, you will give me a contingent reversion in the first sum,'" and the V.-C. then proceeded to consider the character of the bargain thus entered into. But if the Court finds not only that there was an antecedent contract, but that that contract was the causa sine qua non of the appointment, or, to use the language of Lord Romilly in Birley v. Birley (25 Beav. 307, supra, col. 2254), "the reason of the appointment being made to the appointee," or, to use the language of Knight Bruce, L.J. in Pryor v. Pryor, "if the just result of the evidence is that the appointment would not have been made but for the bargain," then the case is different, and the appointment is bad.—p. 216.

Here there were two invalid gifts; the latter was held to fall into the ultimate surplus, the former was held to pass as unappointed. That decision as regards the 100*l.* followed Esauum v. Appleford (5 Myl. & Cr. 56, supra, col. 2205), the 100*l.* not becoming part of and passing with the balance, because that was defined as 260*l.* That case, therefore, is not an authority in favour of the general residuary legatee in the present case.—p. 958.

KEKEWICH, J.—In Kenworthy v. Bate the question was whether a power of appointing real estate to uses was well executed by a devise to trustees to sell, and an appointment of the money produced by the sale; and it was held that it was. And in Cowx v. Foster (supra), where the power was to appoint "to such uses upon and for such trusts" as the tenant for life should by deed or will appoint, Wood, V.-C. held that the appointment to trustees for the benefit of persons who were objects of the power was a good appointment, and that the case before him was a stronger one in favour of the conclusion at which he had arrived than Kenworthy v. Bate.—p. 153.

WOOD, L.J.—Every case of course must turn upon its own facts, though there may be a general principle to be extracted from it. The decision in Bristow v. Warde turned peculiarly upon the actual circumstances of that case, as I had occasion to observe in Peover v. Hassell (supra), founding myself upon Lord St. Leonards' observations, which of course was more satisfactory to me, than simply standing on my own judgment. It was considered by that noble and learned lord, and I concurred in holding, that Bristow v. Warde is not a case which can be considered as laying down the general principle, that in a marriage settlement you are to restrict the words of a general power in the manner in which they were there restricted. There they were restricted on account of the peculiar words used which do not occur in the present case.—p. 618. SELWYN, L.J. concurred.

STIRLING, J.—A distinction was sought to be drawn between the present case and those to which I have referred [Boyle v. Peterborough (Bishop) and Ricketts v. Loftus], on the ground that in them the gift was to a class, and in this it is to named individuals. But it is to be observed that no case has been cited in which a decision that the doctrine laid down in Boyle v. Peterborough (Bishop) does not apply to a case where the objects of the power are designated by name, and not simply described as a class. The doctrine has been applied in Boyle v. Peterborough (Bishop) to a gift to children as a class. It was extended, or perhaps I ought not to say extended, but applied in Ricketts v. Loftus to a gift where the objects of the power were all of them named, but described as the sons and daughters of a certain person by his wife; and I am asked at this time, after the passing of the Act of 1874 [37 & 38 Vict. c. 37], which abolished altogether the doctrine as to non-exclusive powers, not to extend it to a case where the persons who are the objects of the power are indicated by name, and not by description so as to constitute a class. I think I ought not to accede to that view. There is no authority that compels me to adopt that view, and it seems to me that it is inconsistent with the view which has been taken by the profession, as indicated by the three text-writers who have been referred to in the course of the argument, namely, Mr. Jarman, Lord St. Leonards, and Mr. Farwell. [His lordship then referred to Jarman on Wills, 4th ed., vol. ii., p. 265; Sugden on Powers, 8th ed., pp. 421, 423, and Farwell on Powers, p. 134.]—p. 719.

 CHITTY, J.—In Brown v. Higgs the provision was to apply the remainder of the rent "to such children of my nephew S. Brown as my said nephew J. Brown shall think most deserving, and that will make the best use of it, or, to the children of my nephew W. A. Brown, if any such there are or shall be." That case was twice argued before the then M.R., and he held that all the children of S. Brown and the children of his nephew W. A. Brown were entitled. He said [4 Ves. 719], "The fair construction is, that at all events the testator meant it to go to the children, and these words of appointment he used only to give a power to J. Brown to select some and exclude the others." That point came before Lord Eldon on appeal, and he observed at the end of his judgment [8 Ves. 576] that he entertained doubts on the construction of the instrument before him, and would never cease to entertain those doubts, still he affirmed the decree of the M.R., and that decree was also affirmed in the H. L. [18 Ves. 192]. It appears to me that that decision is in point. The reasoning which Lord Eldon applies in his judgment in Brown v. Higgs to Harding v. Glynn [1 Atk. 469, see supra, col. 2195] ought not in my opinion to be applied to the case before me.—p. 248.

ROMER, J.—Next comes Burrough v. Philcox on a very peculiar will. It directed that certain stock and real estate should remain unalienated until certain contingencies were completed, and then gave life interests to children with remainder to their issue, and declared that in default then the same should be disposed of as thereafter mentioned—namely, the survivor of two children to have power of disposal by will among a class mentioned. This was held to create a trust in favour of the class, subject to a power of selection and distribution in the surviving child. And why? Because, by the terms of his will, the testator intended and purported to dispose of the property absolutely, seeing that on the contingencies being completed he declared that the property should be “disposed of” as after mentioned.—p. 180.

ROMER, J.—In Healy v. Donnery there was a gift of a freehold interest to a daughter for life, with power by deed or will to dispose of the same to and among her children, and no gift over in default of appointment. There was, indeed, a residuary gift, but that—as was pointed out by the C. A. in Brierley, In re—is not equivalent to a gift over in default of appointment for the purposes of the above proposition [that a gift in favour of the class is to be implied where the power is not exercised]. The case, therefore, was merely a devise for life with power by deed or will to appoint the remainder to and among the children, and that was held not to give an estate by implication to the children.—p. 180.

HATHERLEY, L.C.—In that case there was a plain absolute gift to a lady for her separate use, and then a power to give among children by will, with no limitation over, and nothing at all pointing to a life interest in the property, but simply this power. The V.-C. held that the circumstances of the power being given did not bring the case within the doctrine of Brown v. Higgs (4 Ves. 717, supra, col. 2271), and that the power was there given, and would probably be given for the purpose of enabling the lady, when under coverture, to dispose by will of the property, and that the absolute right of the lady to the property was not thereby impeached. But here the case is different in two particulars, each of them of importance. First, the sum is to be invested; the dividends are to be paid to each of the children's own use during their respective lives, and if they leave a child or children born in wedlock, then the principal to be at the disposal of the parent by will to such child or children. Further, there is a gift over in the event of there being no child or children.—p. 293. •

CHITTY, J.—There are cases which are plainly distinguishable, such for instance as Phene's Trust, In re, before Sir J. Romilly, where on the true construction of the terms used, he considered that a personal enjoyment was intended by the persons who were the objects of the power, and that being so, he considered himself justified in holding that only those who were living at the time of the death of the donee of the power were entitled to the fund. And White's Trust, In re, before Lord Hatherley, is a case to be referred to the same principle.—p. 251.

Higgs (supra, col. 2271)* and Burrough v. Philcox (supra, col. 2273) being, in his lordship's opinion, too large, and meant doubtless to hold good only where the facts were similar—that is, where the Court could infer that the class was intended to

KAY, J.—Then . . . it was said that this power was like, and must be treated as, a power of revocation and new appointment, and Pomfret v. Perring was referred to, where it was held that a general devise and bequest in exercise of any power whatsoever given to a testatrix by certain indentures or otherwise howsoever did not extend to property which the testatrix could not appoint without exercising a power of revocation. But it must be observed that in that case there was another power to which the appointment could apply, and if that had not been so, no doubt other considerations would have prevailed.—p. 68.

NORTH, J.—In Pomfret v. Perring the power was a special one, and that gives ground for an argument that that case is distinguishable from the present. But I think that the reasons given by the L.JJ. in that case are not addressed to a special power as distinguished from a general power, and the observations of Knight Bruce, L.J., and certainly the earlier observations of Turner, L.J., seem to me to go the whole length required. But, as far as I am concerned, the matter is settled, because not only was that view adopted by Sir J. Romilly, in Palmer v. Newell though it may be said that his observations amount rather to a dictum than to a decision binding upon me, but in the recent case of Charles v. Burke (post), Kay, J. actually decided the very point, and I cannot distinguish that case from the present. . . . But I follow it the more readily when, in my opinion, it is entirely in accordance both with principle and with my own view of the authorities.—p. 677.

STIRLING, J.—In Jamieson v. Trevelyan, which was relied on for the applicants, it was held that the power of jointuring might be exercised by giving an estate to commence in the lifetime of the husband, but that case was a very remarkable one. . . . The ground on which it appears to me that the Court in that case came to the conclusion that the power was properly exercised by giving a jointure by a limitation of the rent-charge to commence at once in the lifetime of the husband was the peculiar language of the will which the Court had to construe.—p. 671.

GRANT, M.R.—I thought so much respect due to the dicta imputed to Lord Hardwicke in Lane v. Page, as to pause upon the decision of a point, with regard to which he seemed to entertain an opinion different from that with which I was impressed. It seemed to me that those dicta could hardly be supposed to refer to a fraud in which the child had no concern, as such a case would have been irrelevant to that before him, where it was the wife's participation in the alleged fraud that could alone create a doubt whether her jointure could be affected. However, upon principle, I do not see how any part of a fraudulent agreement can be supported, except where some consideration has been given, that cannot be restored; and it has, consequently, become impossible to rescind the transaction in toto, and to replace the parties in the same situation. In Lane v. Page the subsequent marriage formed such a consideration on the part of the wife. In Aleyn v. Belchier, where the appointment was subsequent to the marriage, it could hardly be said to have been decided that the appointment was good in any part. For it appears by the registrar's book [Sugden on Powers, Appendix 677] that the bill contained a submission to pay the annuity to the wife, and only sought relief against the other objects of the appointment.—p. 643.

Grant in Danbary v. Cockburn (supra), adds "it is now too late to have that principle as to jointures changed." After that statement of his views, and after so many years, it is not open to me to hold otherwise.—p. 651. And see judgment at length.

Lantsbery v. Collier (1856) 25 L. J. Ch. 672; 2 K. & J. 709, 717; 4 W. R. 826.

WOOD, V.-C.—Now with regard to the first part of the doubt created by Ware v. Polhill, as far as the circumstances of that case were concerned, Lord St. Leonards has said, and it has been repeated since by other authors, that, in truth, the real question which has been supposed to have been decided there did not occur. Lord Eldon puts it as a ground of his decision that it might be a sound doctrine to hold that the power was void, because it might travel through centuries, but still it was by no means a necessary ground for that decision, inasmuch as the circumstances which happened there were these: leaseholds were settled as well as freeholds and copyholds, and the result of the events which happened was, that the leaseholds had become absolutely vested in an infant tenant in tail; and then the question was, whether, after the estate had thus become absolutely vested, the power could be exercised; and certainly there could be no doubt whatever, I think, that when what I may call the uses of the settlement and the purposes of the settlement are spent (and that seems to be the conclusion that Lord St. Leonards arrived at, and, I think, rightly arrived at, in his book), it is clear the power is no longer capable of being exercised; and although in the events which happened there would be a technical difficulty with respect to the power being collateral, still in point of fact the Court would regard the purposes of the settlement as exhausted, and the power being only created for the purposes of the settlement, there would be an end to any exercise of the power which could operate in derogation of an absolute interest acquired by any party under trusts of the settlement. Now, the observations made by Lord St. Leonards on Ware v. Polhill are these: he says [2 Sugden on Powers, 7th ed. p. 468]: "The case was at first treated as an authority that the common power of sale and exchange was void, as too remote, if it were not expressly confined to lives in being and twenty-one years afterwards. But it is clear that Lord Eldon did not mean to impeach the validity of such powers. Such a power does not, like the power in Ware v. Polhill, operate to defeat the estate of the minor tenant in tail, but transfers it from one property to another. He is still tenant in tail; whereas in Ware v. Polhill the effect of a sale might be to defeat altogether the estate of the representative of a person who died entitled to a vested interest in the absolute property." Now, the case I have referred to before Sir J. Leach [Powis v. Capron] was followed by Shadwell, V.-C., and in various other cases which have succeeded it has been held clearly, that where an estate tail is created the power is valid; and the doctrine is extended a step further in Boyce v. Hanning (post. col. 2282).—p. 674.

Lantsbery v. Collier (supra), explained and not applied.

CHITTY, J.—The defendants have referred to Wolley v. Jenkins, and at p. 60 of the report, Sir J. Romilly is reported to have said: "Here the power is to be exercised only with the consent of the husband during his life, and after his death, or twenty-one years, with the consent of the person or persons for the time being entitled to the rents. Now this provision in the settlement, in my opinion, gives additional force to the argument against holding that the right to exercise this power is still subsisting. If it be still subsisting, who are the persons whose consents to exercise it are necessary? The settlement says they must be persons for the time being entitled to the receipt of the annual rents and profits of the hereditaments settled. This means the persons beneficially so entitled, and excludes mere trustees." That is relied upon as a general statement by Sir J. Romilly of what he considers to be the construction of the words "persons entitled to the receipt of the rents"—that it means "beneficially." Sir J. Romilly did not say that. He was referring to the case before him, and it is quite plain, when the power which is stated at p. 54 of the report is considered, that there was no other conclusion to which he could come, because the power was conferred on Wolley (who was the plaintiff in the case) as the surviving trustee, and that power was only to be exercised with the consent in writing of the person for the time being entitled to the receipt of the annual rents and profits of the hereditaments. It must have been therefore persons other than the trustees, because although the exact position of Wolley himself under the settlement is not shown, he clearly was a trustee of this power, and he was to exercise the power with the consent of some other persons, namely, those entitled to the rents, and that must have been those beneficially entitled, otherwise the case would have no meaning. It appears to me, therefore, that is not a statement of a general principle, or in fact a statement of law, which binds me on the present occasion. I have no doubt Sir J. Romilly arrived at a right conclusion, but the case before me is quite different.—p. 242.

JESSEL, M.R.—Two cases have been referred to in argument. One is Doe v. Withers, as to which I need not say whether all the dicta contained in it are good law. I am not satisfied that it ought to be followed, but it does not govern the present case, and it is, therefore, unnecessary to say whether it ought to be overruled. That will be open to the consideration of the C. A., if ever it becomes necessary to decide it. The other case, Easton v. Pratt, substantially governs the present case. The power there was not in the same terms as here, but the case was stronger against the validity of the lease, for the instrument authorized the granting leases at a rack-rent for terms not exceeding twenty-one years, and building or repairing leases for the term of sixty-one years. Here there is only one power, and if the purchaser's construction of it is correct it would be impossible ever to grant a lease of the property at all unless it was first allowed to get out of repair.—p. 256.

DENMAN, C.J. (for the Court).—There is, however, a case in Ventris's Reports, How v. Whitfield, which, if it were to be held as law, might seem to affect the generality of this proposition. A power given to the lessee and his assigns to let leases for twenty-one years, rendering the ancient rents, and the assignee made a lease of the lands inter alia, at the rent of six shillings a year, which was the ancient rent. As to reserving the rent proinde, the Court said that it might be intended that the inter alia comprehended nothing but such things out of which a rent could not be reserved; and then the six shillings was reserved only for the five acres. However, the proinde might be reasonably referred only to the five acres, and not to the inter alia, and that a distinct reservation of the six shillings might be for five acres. But in the report of the same case (Sir T. Jones, 110), it is said the Court thought this to be a good exception: and the defendant perceiving the opinion of the Court, as to the great point, consented, upon payment of costs, that judgment should be given for the plaintiff. The case is also reported in 2 Shower 57, where it appears to have argued upon another point; and Jones and Penbertton, JJ. seemed to have entertained different opinions; and the case as reported in Ventris, it should seem, cannot be relied upon.—p. 749.

KAY, J.—That was a case of ejectment, the ground of the action being that the lease was altogether void: but Lord Ellenborough did not so decide, and held that the insertion of a covenant of that kind [to renew the lease at all times during the life of the lessor] did not make the whole lease void, and that the covenant itself was not necessarily void; but that when the time to perform it came, unless it could be shown that the rent stipulated for was the best rent which could then be obtained, any lease granted under the covenant to renew would be bad. Now that same point arose in Dowell v. Dew (post).—p. 533.

Gas Light and Coke Co. v. Towse (1887) 35 Ch. D. 519: 56 L. J. Ch. 889: 56 L. T. 602.

KAY, J.—There was [in Harnett v. Yeilding] a lease for twenty-one years made by a tenant for life—undoubtedly a lease under a power, although not expressly so stated in the report—containing a contract to renew that lease by granting a further lease for twenty-one years at any time during his life. Lord Redesdale thought the contract was bad (p. 532). [His lordship then discussed Doe v. Bettison (supra, col. 2285) and Dowell v. Dew (supra), and continued:] That being the state of the authorities, the point came before Lord St. Leonards himself, the highest possible authority on this question of powers, and he thus states the law in his Treatise on Powers (Sugden on Powers, 8th ed., pp. 787, 788, pl. 22, 23). He mentions Doe v. Bettison, and then he says: "The last case has been considered as at variance with the position laid down by Lord Redesdale in Harnett v. Yeilding, where the lessor covenanted by the old lease to execute a further lease for twenty-one years, at any time during his life, at the old rent, and Lord Redesdale thought that covenant objectionable. In a later case in Ireland, the Chancellor" (that was Lord St. Leonards himself) "observed that he could not entirely go along with Lord Redesdale in that proposition, for though it would be an objection if at the time when the contract is to be performed it is not the best rent, he did not see how it was an objection if at that time the old rent was the best rent. What harm was done in such a case when the new lease is within the power?" The case he refers to is Dyas v. Cruise (supra). The authorities therefore concur in establishing this proposition—that in a lease under a power a covenant to renew that lease at the expiration of the term is a good covenant, even though the first lease was for the full term authorised by the power: but that when the time for carrying that covenant into effect arrives by the expiration of the first lease, then it must be shown that the rent and covenants stipulated for are such as are the best rent and the proper covenants at that time.—p. 534.

WILLES, J.—In the report of Leete v. Hart, a semble is introduced into the headnote "that even an honest belief would be insufficient, unless the defendant had reasonable grounds for such belief;" but the headnote of the reporter, as well as the judgments of the judges, must be taken with reference to the facts of that case. The decision in that case merely amounts to this: there must be facts on which a belief could be based. If it goes further it is in conflict with the decision of the Ex. Ch. in Roberts v. Orchard. It is clear from the judgments that there was not the slightest intention on the part of the judges in any way to deviate from the law as laid down in that case.—p. 478.

KEATING, J.—The judgments of the L.C.J., my brother M. Smith, and myself, all distinctly proceed on the ground that there were no facts in Leete v. Hart on which to ground a belief at all. The judgment of my brother Hyles contains expressions upon which the semble inserted in the head-note was probably based; but his judgment, like the others in the case, must be read in relation to the facts of the particular case, without straining the effect of particular expressions; and it is obvious, that so read it is quite consistent with the decisions in Hermann v. Seneschal and Roberts v. Orchard (supra).—p. 479.

Agnew v. Jobson (1877) 47 L. J. M. C. 67; 13 Cox, C. C. 625.

LOPES, J.—I am of opinion that the defendant Jobson was not entitled to notice of action. There was a total absence of any authority to do the act, and although he acted bona fide, believing he had authority, there was nothing on which to ground the belief; no knowledge of any fact such a belief might be based on. Cook v. Leonard (post, col. 2289), Leete v. Hart and King v. Chamberlain are strong authorities in favour of this view. It was said that Leete v. Hart was distinguished from the present case on the ground that the defendant in that case was a private individual, whereas the defendant Jobson was a magistrate, clothed with the general authority of his office. But I do not think that this makes any substantial difference, or destroys the effect of that and the other cases I have cited.—p. 68.

KEATING, J.—The only remaining objection urged against the defendant's right to notice of action is, that cases of non-feasance are not cases in which the protection of notice of action is given. That is not so; Wilson v. Halifax Corporation (supra, col. 2290), Davis v. Curling (supra, col. 2290), Newton v. Ellis (supra), and *Judge v. BOWEN, L.J.—As to the question whether the plaintiffs here could properly have been joined in the first instance if the point had been taken in time, it is unnecessary for us to decide; but, as at present advised, I hesitate to accept the wider view of the construction of Ord. XVI., rule 1, taken by the M.R. I am not prepared to say that this rule gives unlimited power to plaintiffs to join any number of causes of action, whether separate or distinct, against a single defendant. It is to be observed that the rule is framed in a peculiar manner. It says: "All persons may be joined as plaintiffs in whom the right to any relief claimed is alleged to exist," and I feel a difficulty in assuming that these words mean the same thing as if the rule had said "in whom any right to any relief is alleged to exist." for I think so startling an alteration in the law would have been expressed in more apt words. I therefore do not wish to lay down that the rule goes to that extent. I am bound by Booth v. Briscoe, so far as it goes, but I do not think it goes to that extent. Booth v. Briscoe only decides that the action there could be justified within the rule. It was an action for a single libel brought by eight trustees of a charity, who were libelled in their conduct as such trustees, and all Booth v. Briscoe really decides is that the mere fact that each plaintiff who joined in the action might have brought a separate action, is not sufficient reason to prevent the plaintiffs joining in one action. I have not had the opportunity, nor the time, in the course of this argument, to consider all the different circumstances that might arise if there was an unlimited power in any number of plaintiffs, however separate and distinct their causes of action, to join themselves in a single writ, provided the defendant is the same, and throw upon the defendant the burden of striking the plaintiffs out. Therefore I do not feel sure that Booth v. Briscoe decides so much as my learned brother thinks that it decides. Here it is sufficient to say that I think, in the first place, the parties have treated the matter in a way which renders it impossible for the defendant now to contend that the plaintiffs were not properly suing under Order XVI. r. 1: and in the second place, the action, being one in which a single act is alleged to have damaged both the reversioner and the tenant in possession, may possibly fall within the precedent of Booth v. Briscoe.—p. 545.

WILLS, J.—I do not think the present case [in which one action was brought by two plaintiffs for distinct slanders] is covered by authority, for in Gort (Viscount) v. Rowney (supra), Esher, M.R. and Bowen, L.J. disagreed as to the effect of the decision in Booth v. Briscoe, and the question is therefore an open one. In Booth v. Briscoe eight co-trustees brought an action as plaintiffs for a single libel reflecting on them all, and the Court held that they were all rightly joined as plaintiffs; but that is not the same case as the present.—p. 405. A. L. SMITH, L.J.—As I read Smurthwaite v. Hannay, the question of the joinder of two plaintiffs equally applies to joinder of two defendants: and I agree with what Mr. Littleton said that Smurthwaite v. Hannay has decided that Ord. XVI. has relation to the joinder of parties and not to the joinder of causes of action. I differ from my brother Rigby in this case because he thinks that there is a joint cause of action against the two.—p. 27.

JEUNE, P.—This is a very different case from that of Smurthwaite v. Hannay. There persons were suing together who could not so sue. There was a very material matter involved, and there was much more than a mere irregularity; but having regard to the Admiralty practice in this Court, which, I think, is not abrogated, and having regard to the indorsement on the writ, I am of opinion that in the Admiralty Court, where the only mistake made is that of not putting on the face of the writ what has been put on the back, and what if put on the face of the writ would have made it good, there is a mere irregularity.—p. 155.

LINDLEY, M.R.—The decision of Lord Eldon in Weale v. West Middlesex Waterworks Co. (1820) 1 J. & W. 358; 21 R. R. 183) was, I should have thought, extremely easy. In the first place, it was not a bill by one on behalf of himself and others. That was carefully avoided, and the real object of the suit was to compel the Court of Chancery to settle the price to be paid for water. The judgment is of considerable importance, because it is an extremely instructive one, and Lord Eldon refers to all sorts of cases in which a bill by one on behalf of himself and others would not lie, and the most important of all is that which counsel for the defendant relied on. My answer to that case is this, that we have advanced a long way since Lord Eldon's time in suits of this description, and suits have been maintained by one on behalf of himself and others which perhaps Lord Eldon would not have sanctioned. Above all, now you can have under the Judicature Acts actions to declare rights, which is an innovation of a very important kind. . . . Counsel for the defendant referred to another case of Lord Eldon's, of Jones v. Garcia del Rio, which was to the effect that persons who had lost their money in subscribing to the Peruvian Loan could not sue on behalf of themselves and others. But that has been reconsidered and to a certain extent modified in modern times in Beeching v. Lloyd. . . . Whether that is an advance on Lord Eldon's doctrine or not, I do not know. The circumstances were different, because there the ground for rescission of the contract was a fraudulent prospectus. I understand that case as warranting an action by one on behalf of himself and others who have been defrauded by the prospectus to get the money back. Now the principle on which the old Courts of equity allowed suits by some on behalf of themselves and others was very much discussed in Warrick v. Queen's College, Oxford (post), in which there is a most instructive judgment on this point. That was a bill filed by two or three freeholders of a manor claiming common. There was a very great deal of litigation about the frame of the suit, and in point of fact a great deal depended on it, and Lord Hatherley held that an action in that form would lie, although each freeholder could sue on his separate prescriptive right.—p. 293.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—That [Smurthwaite v. Hannay (supra, col. 2294)] was an action brought by a number of holders of bills of lading against shipowners, claiming damages for the non-delivery of the goods specified in their bills of lading. I read that decision as applying both to actions in contract and in tort; but if there is any doubt as to this, it is only necessary to refer to Peninsular & Oriental Steam Navigation Co. v. Tsune Kijima in the P. C., which was a suit under Lord Campbell's Act, in which numerous plaintiffs sought to recover separate damages as due to each plaintiff or group of plaintiffs for injuries resulting from a collision at sea. In that case it was held that there was no authority to warrant the joinder in one suit of different and distinct causes of action not being causes of action by and against the same parties.—p. 542.

STIRLING, J.—According to the interpretations put on the rule [Ord. XVI. r. 1] by the C. A. [Stroud v. Lawson],—and, indeed, it seems to me plain on the face of the rule itself—there are two conditions to be satisfied: First, that the right of relief alleged to exist in each plaintiff should be in respect of or arise out of the same transaction; and, secondly, that there should be a common question of fact or law.—p. 37.

BYRNE, J.—Prior to this order [Ord. XVI. r. 1] being made there had been certain decisions, notably Smurthwaite v. Hannay (supra, col. 2294), in which it had been held that the old Ord. XVI. r. 1, dealt merely with the parties to an action, and had no reference to joinder of several causes of action; and that where the causes of action of several plaintiffs were separate and distinct, the same could not be joined in one action. Since the new order has come into operation one case has been decided by the C. A.—namely, Stroud v. Lawson—which assists in interpreting this rule. In that case the plaintiff commenced an action claiming damages from the directors of a company for inducing him by fraud to purchase shares in the company. In the same action he sought relief, suing as a representative plaintiff, not on the ground of fraud, but on the ground that the payment of dividends out of capital was ultra vires and illegal. It was held that it did not come within Ord. XVI. r. 1, because it could not be said that the right to relief arose out of the same transaction or series of transactions.—p. 181.

STIRLING, J.—Therefore, what is alleged is a joint cause of action. In my judgment this case is distinguishable from Sadler v. G. W. Ry., which was relied on on this point. The decision there was that claims for damages against two or more defendants in respect of their several liability for separate torts could not be combined in one action. The present case is not one of suing several defendants on account of several liability for several torts, but jointly in respect of their joint acts.—p. 701.

Ry.* (supra, col. 2299), said: We are bound by that decision, and, speaking for myself, I cordially agree with it. It seems to me impossible, in the face of that decision, to work Ord. XVI. r. 7 in the way the plaintiffs seek. It is said that we took a different view from this in Bennetts v. Mellwraith. I do not think that that is so. There I said that the redress was sought against two persons, "but the right to it arose out of one common transaction." The two were not as here, independent tort-feasors. That case, therefore, does not conflict with our decision in the present case.—p. 627.

COLLINS, L.J.—It was I who at chambers struck out the defendants in Smurthwaite v. Hannay (supra, col. 2294) and allowed the defendant to be added in Bennetts v. Mellwraith. I wish to point out that, in the view I take, the orders I made in those two cases are quite consistent. Bennetts v. Mellwraith, in my judgment, does not in the least conflict with the principle we are applying in the present case. In Bennetts v. Mellwraith there was one contract only, and one breach only of that one contract. The difficulty was, which of two persons broke it? If the person who purported to act as agent for another had authority to make the contract, then it was broken by that other person, his principal. If, however, he had not authority, then the truth of the matter is it was broken by himself. But whichever of the two was liable, there was only one contract and one breach.—p. 628.

LINDLEY, M.R.—The learned judge has, in my opinion, misapplied Gower v. Couldridge. I do not quarrel with that decision. It is perfectly intelligible. In that case there were separate liabilities in respect of two distinct and separate torts. There was a conspiracy between two people, and then the issue of an improper prospectus by them and another; and it was held that the claims for damages in respect of those two things could not be joined. The issue of the prospectus was not the common ground of action against all the defendants. I do not say that the prospectus had nothing to do with it, but there were distinct and separate causes of action in the narrow sense alleged there. In this case, I repeat, in the wide sense, the whole case turns upon the prospectus, and there is nothing more than a complaint against a number of persons who are said to have done the plaintiff one wrong by issuing a prospectus which they had no right in point of law to issue.—p. 149.

ROGER, J.—As regards . . . Gower v. Couldridge . . . it is merely a case illustrating the principle that if there is a cause of action against A. and B. for a tort X., and quite a separate cause of action against B. for a tort Y., claims cannot be brought in one action in respect of both torts. X. and Y., against A. and B. As regards Thompson v. London County Council, that only illustrates another principle which has no application to the case before us. If you have suffered a wrong, and it may be that A. is the person who has committed the act that caused it, and if he did he is liable, but it is not certain that it was not B. who committed it, and if it was B. he would be liable, and A. and B. are strangers to one another in the matter, you cannot, because you cannot ascertain whether A. or B. was the person committing the wrong, bring the action for damages against A. and B. jointly.—p. 150.

JETNE, P.—It will be observed in that case [Walcott v. Lyons] that the C. A. would apparently have allowed the substitution if the terms they imposed had been acceded to; and in Long v. Crossley a plaintiff with a right was clearly substituted for a plaintiff with none.—p. 207.

COLLINS, M.R.—I need not refer to the authorities, except the last one, The Duke of Buccleuch, which is quite conclusive. In each of the cases the right asserted by the new plaintiff excluded the right claimed for the original plaintiff, and in one of them the element present in this case was also present—a decision adverse to the original plaintiff; nevertheless Sir G. Jessel made an order under rule 2 [Ord. XVI.] allowing new plaintiffs to be added. Adding and substituting are practically the same thing.—p. 804.

COZENS-HARDY, L.J.—It is said that Ord. XVI. r. 2 does not apply where the original plaintiff had no right of action at all. If authority were needed against that it will be found in Carswell v. Hyland, which is directly in point. In that case the heir-at-law had no right of action, and the administratrix of the trustee was allowed to be added as a co-plaintiff. It is said that that was a case of adding, and not of substituting a plaintiff, but the Court may either substitute or add a plaintiff in a proper case.—p. 804.

A. L. SMITH, J.—With regard to the cases cited, Duckett v. Gover, as explained in Mason v. Harris (supra), so far from being an authority in favour of the plaintiff, is an authority against him, because in the latter case the M.R. said that he never intended to decide in Duckett v. Gover that consent was not necessary, and that the consent of the party added in that case had been obtained. Turquand v. Pearson (post, col. 2303) is not really an authority on the point now in question, because the party sought to be added had neither consented, nor had he been offered an indemnity.—p. 680.

COLLINS, M.R.—Duckett v. Gover and Ayscough v. Bullar are clear authorities on the point raised before us. In each case the right asserted by the new plaintiff excluded that of the original one. In those cases plaintiffs were added, but there can be no difference in principle whether a plaintiff is added or substituted, and both adding and substituting are specially mentioned in the rule [Ord. XVI. r. 2].—p. 487.

CHITTY, J.—It is said that the point now before me was not decided in Tryon v. National Provident Institution, because it does not appear from that case that the person proposed to be joined as co-plaintiff was a trustee for the persons who proposed to join him. I am not satisfied that that is a correct statement of the case. It appears to me, as well as I can make out the facts, though I am not clear on all the facts, that the person proposed to be joined did stand in the relation of trustee to the person who proposed to join him. If so, that would be an express decision on the point. But, however that may be, I decide this case as if it were new, on the express words of Ord. XVI. r. 11, which are sufficiently clear to enable me to dispense with authorities.—p. 650.

him before the Court at all, because the defendant was violating the rights of the plaintiff, and the fact that those rights were to a certain extent vested in another person did not prevent the plaintiff from suing to prevent an infringement of those rights.—p. 390.

BUCKLEY, J.—It is true that there is a class of cases in which a defendant can be added adversely to the wish of the plaintiff, as in Wilson v. Church, where the claim is made against a member of a class. In such circumstances, if a person, a member of the class, asks to be added as a defendant, saying he takes a different view from that which the plaintiff takes, though the plaintiff objects to his being added as a defendant, yet certainly he may be. . . . There [Dix v. G. W. Ry.] the plaintiff sued a railway company upon a covenant by which the defendant company had agreed with the plaintiff to make a road between certain points for the use of the plaintiff and two other covenantees, with whom the defendant company entered into separate and similar covenants. The plaintiff brought the action against the company for specific performance of the covenant and damages, without joining the other separate covenantees. The plaintiff was not the only person interested in the road, but the two other covenantees were also. Kay, J. accordingly held, under Ord. XVI. r. 11, that the two separate covenantees ought to be added as parties to the action, and made an order accordingly, though the plaintiff objected. . . . In Dix v. G. W. Ry. the Court could not effectually and completely adjudicate upon and settle all the questions involved, without the presence before the Court of the two other covenantees. It was a case of the same class as Wilson v. Church.—p. 448.

ESHER, M.R.—It is said that Pilley v. Robinson laid down that where an action is brought against one only of several joint contractors, the defendant is entitled as of right to have his co-contractors joined as defendants; but if that case was not overruled in Wilson, Sons & Co. v. Balcarres Brook Steamship Co., it was to some extent explained. The state of the law seems to me to be this: if the co-contractors are within the jurisdiction and can be found, they ought to be joined, not because it is obligatory on the plaintiff to join them, but because, if there is no reason to the contrary, all the co-contractors ought to be joined as defendants. If it were shown in this case that all might have been joined, it would be right to compel the plaintiff to take that course.—p. 607. KAY, L.J., concurred.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—In Pilley v. Robinson the Divisional Court held that one co-contractor who is sued is entitled as of right to have his co-contractors joined as defendants. A similar point, though on different facts, came before this Court in Wilson, Sons & Co. v. Balcarres Brook Steamship Co., in which it was held, that where one co-contractor is out of the jurisdiction, it is not necessary to the continuance of the action that he should be joined as a defendant. So far that case overruled the hard and fast line laid down in Pilley v. Robinson. The M.R. foresaw that such a case as that now before us might arise, and expressed the view that there might be circumstances under which the Court could refuse to insist on all the joint contractors being joined as defendants. That case has now arisen, and I agree with the view then expressed, and now confirmed by the M.R.—p. 689.

ESHER, M.R.—The judges in the Court below thought themselves bound by Norris v. Beazley. I think that that case is not in point. All it shows is that the new defendants could not be brought in without the consent of the plaintiffs. I assume, for the purpose of deciding the present case, that the decision in Norris v. Beazley was correct, but it is not applicable here, because the plaintiffs do consent to the new defendants being added.—p. 667.

BYRNE, J.—The important case of Bawtree v. Great North-West Central Ry. (which I am surprised to find reported only in the Times Law Reports) is, I think, in point, and I do not consider the suggested distinction between that case and the present—namely, that there the validity of a charge on land in Canada was sub judice in Canada, while in the present case it is admitted that there is no subsisting charge by Brazilian law on the land in Brazil—is sufficient to differentiate the cases. As I understand the evidence about the Brazilian law, the plaintiffs, if they can so far establish their claim in England upon the contract, hope to be able to complete their title in Brazil also; and I see no reason why they should be prevented from endeavouring so to complete it.—p. 623.

Jessel, M.R., said it is binding upon all persons who are represented, if the suit has been fairly conducted. But if there is fraud (he only puts that by way of illustration) the decree would not be binding; . . . and it would be perfectly competent to any person, who was alleged to be bound by a representative decree, to say that, in point of fact, or in point of law, by reason of something that had been done, he ought not to be held as being bound. BOWEN, L.J. (for self and COTTON, L.J.).—Kirk v. Todd seems to us materially in point. There the owners of certain dye-works sued the original defendants for fouling and polluting a brook. It was held that the action would not survive against their executors. . . . In every case where one man fouls the flow of water to which another is entitled he probably saves himself expense by doing so. But the benefit to which the M.R. alludes appears to us to be some beneficial property, or value capable of being measured, followed, and recovered.—p. 463.

ROMER, J.—If the claimant was suing, or was entitled to sue, on the footing that the price paid for the shares was still the claimant's property, then I agree that the rule [Actio personæ movetur cum personâ] does not apply—See Phillips v. Homfray (post), where the limits of the rule are examined. On the other hand, if the claimant can only sue for unliquidated damages, then the rule applies—See Kirk v. Todd, where Sir G. Jessel, M.R. observes, "As I understand the rule at common law it was this—you could not sue executors for a wrong committed by their testator for which you could only recover unliquidated damages."—p. 254.

KEKEWICH, J.—They [the orders of the Supreme Court] are not binding upon the H. L., and they do not apply to costs in the H. L., and I cannot possibly say that because, if this had been an action in this Court. Mr. Raphael would have been entitled to recover no costs, therefore he is not entitled to recover costs incurred in the H. L. On that Johnson v. Lindsay & Co. does not help me in the least. . . . For the like reason I cannot find much to guide me in the otherwise instructive case of Carson v. Pickersgill, because that is a decision respecting the application of the Rules of the Supreme Court; and it was there held that a successful plaintiff in an action in forma pauperis before a judge and jury was entitled upon taxation, as against the defendant, to costs out of pocket only, and could not be allowed anything for remuneration to his solicitor or fees to counsel. The fact that it was tried by a jury was much discussed, and it went entirely on the rules, and did not touch upon the principle. . . . There is no authority upon the point, as I have said; but there is a very useful case [Richardson v. Richardson (supra)] before Sir F. Jeune, in which he expressed an opinion, subject no doubt to revision, if the actual point came before him, that a solicitor could sue his pauper client on his retainer. . . . Of course, that opinion is not binding upon me, and is not really a judicial decision, but it is a valuable and instructive opinion of a learned judge not upon the particular point before him, but in an action which involved a long disquisition on the subject of costs when a man sues in forma pauperis.—p. 311.

COLLINS, L.J.—In reference to the point which suggested itself in argument as to the practice at common law, I have referred to Chitty's Archbold's Practice (12th ed.). and I notice that at

p. 1289 [11th ed., p. 1277] it is stated that "Every poor person, who may have cause of action, shall have writs according to the nature of his case, and the justices shall assign him counsel and attorneys, who, together with the officers of the Court, shall act gratis." This substantially is what the statute 11 Hen. 7, c. 12, provides. That practice appears to be still followed, and I cannot find that there is any provision for the payment of any remuneration to such counsel or solicitor.—p. 403.

ESHER, M.R.—We have consulted the other members of the C. A., and we are unanimously of opinion that the rule that no one can proceed in forma pauperis in matters on the Crown side is applicable only to Crown cases pure and simple. Proceedings like this, on appeal from the County Court, are between party and party. They are not Crown cases at all, properly so called.—p. 223.

LOPES, L.J.—I think it is immaterial whether the documents in question were exhibited to the affidavit made by the plaintiff or not. The case laid before counsel and his opinion are solely for the information of the judge to whom the application for leave to sue as a pauper is made, and the opposite party has no right to see them. In stating this I am stating no more than what was said by Coleridge, J. in Bryant v. Wagner, where he says: "The certificate of counsel . . . is not for the benefit of the opposite party, but for the information of the Court." Hinchliffe, In re, is an entirely different case from the present. The judges there had not such a case as this present to their minds. If they had, there can be no doubt they would have distinguished it.—p. 73.

MALINS, V.-C.—I there [Doss v. Secretary of State for India (supra)] decided that if a person had a claim to property in India the proper tribunal for the recovery of such property was in India, where there are Courts armed with every requisite power for granting relief. . . . That was a suit in which the plaintiff claimed a debt, and if I was right in that case in holding that the Indian Courts were the proper tribunals, how much stronger is this case, where the claim is for land in India ! It is not the practice to entertain suits in this country for the recovery of land in a foreign country. That was decided in Holmes, In re (post). That was a petition of right in respect of land in Canada, and a demurrer was allowed on the ground that the Queen was as much resident in Canada as in this country, and that the suit ought to have been brought in Canada. I decided Blake v. Blake upon the same principle. There the suit was to recover land in Ireland, and I allowed a plea which put the suit out of Court. I arrived at the same conclusion in Matthaei v. Galitzin, where a bill was filed to obtain a receiver in regard to property in Russia, and by allowing the demurrer that suit was put an end to.—p. 385.

Gledhill v. Hunter (1880) 14 Ch. D. 492 ; 49 L. J. Ch. 333 ; 42 L. T. 392 ; 28 W. R. 530.

JESSEL, M.R.—The first question I have to decide is whether an action commenced by a writ indorsed as this is—putting aside for a moment the statement of claim—is “an action for the recovery of land,” within the meaning of Ord. XVII. r. 2. Upon that I am referred to a decision of Hall, V.-C., in Whetstone v. Dewis, in which he is supposed to have decided that an action to establish title to land is an action for recovery of land within the rule. I say “supposed to have decided,” because I do not think he finally decided the question. His judgment is this : “I think that an action to establish title to land is an action for the recovery of land so as to require the leave of the Court under R. S. C. 1875, Ord. XVII. r. 2, for its joinder with another cause of action :” and he gave the leave. I agree, the V.-C. says “I think :” but the matter only came before him upon an application for leave, and the leave could do no harm ; it might have been granted ex abundanti cautela ; and a judge saying “I think,” on the 24th of November, 1875—three weeks after the new rules came into operation—cannot be said to have given a final judgment where there was no argument, but a mere application for leave. I think, therefore, I ought not to treat this as a deliberate decision by Hall, V.-C., that such an action is an action for the recovery of land within the rules.

Although I wish to treat the decision with every possible respect, I look upon the case as one where an ex parte application for leave is made to a judge and he says, "I think so and so, and I will give you leave." That cannot preclude him—much less can it preclude other judges—from afterwards deliberately considering the question and deciding it after argument. In fact, I decline to treat this as a binding authority upon me. Even if it were a deliberate judgment, it would not be binding upon me, but I should be very loth to differ from it, although the matter might ultimately go to the Appeal Court to be finally settled.—p. 494.

KAY, L.J.—It has been argued that Poulett v. Hill has absolutely decided that the moment a receiver has been appointed the case is not one in which there is a liquidated sum for which the writ can be specially indorsed under Ord. III. r. 6, for the purposes of Ord. XIV. I do not think that is the result of that case. That case was one in which the mortgagees had brought an action to realize their security, and before an account had been taken a receiver was appointed, and subsequently the plaintiffs brought another action for interest in which they applied for judgment under Ord. XIV. The Court said that the case was not one in which a writ ought to have been indorsed for a liquidated sum, inasmuch as there was a prior action proceeding in which an account must be taken. To say that this was a decision that the mere appointment of a receiver prevents the indorsement of the writ with a claim for a liquidated sum is altogether a misapprehension.—p. 186.

A. L. SMITH, J.—In Elliott v. Roberts, Coleridge, C.J. and Mathew, J. decided that a writ was not specially indorsed because the interest claimed was abnormal (the case, however, was little argued). In Blood v. Robinson, Coleridge, C.J. and Cave, J. held that a claim for the amount of a bill of exchange, for money paid, money lent, and interest, was a good special indorsement. These cases raised a doubt as to whether there had not been wrong decisions under Ord. XIV. at chambers, and at last two cases were argued before a Court composed of five judges. These cases (Sheba Gold Mining Co. v. Trubshawe and Ryley v. Master (supra)) decided that where a plaintiff has to resort to the provisions of 3 & 4 Wm. 4, c. 42, s. 28, in order to make a claim for interest by way of damages, he cannot make a good specially indorsed writ. They left untouched the present point upon s. 57 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882.—p. 694.

ESHER, M.R.—Arden v. Boyce shows that if a tenancy is put an end to by forfeiture, then the provisions of Ord. III. r. 6 (F.), do not apply, and judgment cannot be obtained under Ord. XIV. . . . Here there was a clause in the mortgage deed which created a tenancy from year to year, followed subsequently by a provision under which the landlord was entitled at any time without notice to enter upon and take possession of the premises. That being so, there was no forfeiture. Arden v. Boyce, therefore, does not apply.—p. 533.

ESHER, M.R.—If the rule [Ord. XLVIII. A. r. 11] had contained words expressly in terms including a foreigner resident abroad, then an English Court would be bound to obey the directions of its own legislature, but when the words used are capable of one or other construction, then the Court ought to adopt the construction which will prevent an infringement upon the principles of international law by extending the jurisdiction of the English Courts against foreigners residing abroad, who have in no way submitted to the jurisdiction. That rule was laid down by the C. A. in Russell v. Cambefort. Cotton, L.J. in that case pointed out the reasons for it, and gave the canon of construction. He said: "Although the rule does authorise service on one member of a partnership in general terms, yet it ought to be construed only as applying to partnerships, the members of which either by their nationality or residence have become subject to English law, and to the power of Parliament." . . . Now, Russell v. Cambefort, which overruled O'Neil v. Clason (supra, col. 2320), decided in terms that under a similar rule in r. 11. of Ord. XLVIII. D., where there is a single foreigner resident abroad, although he does carry on business within the jurisdiction, the rule does not apply, because the effect would be to make the English Parliament assume jurisdiction over a foreigner wholly resident abroad. Russell v. Cambefort has never been overruled. On the contrary, it has been recognised as a binding authority by Chitty, J., in Shepherd v. Hirsch, Pritchard & Co. (supra, col. 2321); by Coleridge, C.J. and Wright, J. in Grant v. Anderson, and by this Court in Western National Bank v. Perez Triana & Co. . . . It was said that the words in r. 1, "carrying on business within the jurisdiction," must be read into r. 11, by virtue of the concluding words of that rule, and had the effect of altering the effect of it. But the words "carrying on business within the jurisdiction" are already in r. 11; you cannot read them in over again, and the similar rule, with those words in it, had already been construed not to include a foreigner resident abroad before the alteration was made in r. 1. The alteration, therefore, in the rule could not affect the construction already given in Russell v. Cambefort to the similar rule to r. 11.—pp. 102-104.

POLLOCK, B.—I felt at first pressed by Newby v. Von Oppen, but upon consideration I think it clearly distinguishable. There the very existence of the company as a trading corporation made it essential to have a place of business, with a manager, in England. In the present case, looking at the character of the company, and the duty of the agent, it may be said to be a mere accident that they employed a booking clerk of their own at Carlisle.—p. 135.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—It is too late to discuss the meaning of the expression "corporation aggregate" in Ord. IX. r. 8, and whether it applied to foreign corporations trading in this country, because the question has already been the subject of judicial decision binding upon this Court. It has been held that the rule applies to such corporations, and it seems to me on reading the judgment of the Court delivered by Blackburn, J. in Newby v. Von Oppen, and the judgment of Cotton, L.J. in Haggin v. Comptoir d'Escompte (supra), that the law is that if a corporation established by foreign law carries on business here in such a way that it may be said to be resident in this country, it must be equally liable to service as if it was established here. The question, therefore, is one of fact. . . . I am aware of what the L.C. (Lord Cranworth) and Lord Brougham held in Carron Iron Co. v. MacLaren (1855) 24 L. J. Ch. 620; 5 H. L. Cas. 416; 3 W. R. 597.—H.L. (E.), see post, col. 2356), but Lord St. Leonards took a different view of the facts, and Blackburn, J. . . . in Newby v. Von Oppen, treats the decision of the majority of the lords in Carron Iron Co. v. MacLaren as a finding of fact. But findings of fact are not binding upon us.—p. 13.

COLLINS, L.J.—In order to understand the decisions upon the rule it is necessary to examine the genesis of the principle upon which it has been found possible to reach a foreign corporation by English process. It was at first thought that a foreign corporation must be reached by some process for service out of the jurisdiction. Then arose the cases in which a corporation carried on business in more than one place, so that it could be contended that, although one and indivisible, it had more than one domicile. That was the question discussed in Carron Iron Co. v. MacLaren; but it is clear now that a corporation can have more than one domicile.—p. 15.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—What happened in that case [British Wagon Co. v. Gray] was this: The words "unless the defendant is domiciled or ordinarily resident in Scotland," which have now been inserted in Ord. XI. r. 1 (e), prohibit the Court from allowing service of a writ out of the jurisdiction in a case which otherwise would fall within the rule where the defendant is ordinarily domiciled or resident in Scotland or Ireland. . . . It seems to me that the pith of the case is put by Lopes, L.J. in his judgment when he says that the parties cannot by any contract between themselves give the Court jurisdiction to do that which by the terms of the rule it is forbidden to do. Lord Esher in his judgment says the same. That case, therefore, is clearly distinguishable from the present, for here no application to the Court is made by the plaintiffs, and no application is necessary.—p. 315.

LORD SHAND.—I am clearly of opinion that the view taken by the learned judges in those two cases as to the sound construction of this rule (rd. XI. r. 1 (e)) is the right one. The result of those cases, I take it, is practically this—at when it is shown that a plaintiff is entitled to require the performance of a contract in this country, and that consequently a breach takes place in this country, a right to serve process out of the country exists; but I hold upon the authority of those cases . . .

be in accordance with sound principle, that the rule is limited to that, and that there is no right to serve out of the jurisdiction where the performance of the contract may either be within the jurisdiction or abroad in the option of one of the parties.—p. 888.

HUDDLESTON, B.—In that case leave of the Court for the issue of the writ had been obtained. The writ in this case is obviously one for service within the jurisdiction, no leave was obtained to issue it, and the words, "15, Queen Street, in the City of London," were inserted for the purpose of serving the secretary of the company, who happened to be passing through London.—p. 781.

KEKEWICH, J.—The meaning of that clause [Ord. XI. r. 1 (g)] was carefully considered by Pearson, J. in Yorkshire Tannery and Boot Manufactory v. Eglinton Chemical Co., and he came to the conclusion that the other party to the action upon the service on whom the propriety of the service out of the jurisdiction depends, must have been served before the Court can allow service on the party out of the jurisdiction. That, so far as I am aware, has always been held to be the meaning of the rule, except that some doubt was thrown upon it in Tassell v. Hallen. It would be presumptuous on my part to criticise the language of the late L.C.J.; but there is no occasion to do anything of the kind, because his lordship took pains to show, that though he was not satisfied with the conclusion of Pearson, J., he was not then sure that that conclusion was wrong, and Collins, J., who sat with him and was the only other judge present, did not adopt the criticism of the L.C.J., but did adopt the reasoning of Pearson, J.—p. 236.

KEKEWICH, J.—The principle seems to me to be contained in Witted v. Galbraith, which was very much discussed. You must have, as Lindley, L.J. said, "a bona fide case of an action properly brought against a person who has been served within the jurisdiction," and not an action brought against such person simply to enable the plaintiff to bring in other defendants who are to be served out of the jurisdiction.—p. 237.

BLACKBURN, J.—If the whole cause of action—that is, the contract and the breach—does not arise within the jurisdiction, then sects. 18 and 19 have no application. The Court of Exchequer have decided this point in this way, and in my opinion that decision is quite right. Two cases are given, in a note to sect. 18, in Mr. Day's Common Law Procedure Acts: Slade v. Noel, and Nettlefold v. Fünche, in which it is said that although the contracts were made abroad, yet the cause of action, within the meaning of sect. 18, arose within the jurisdiction. Those cases appear to be reported ex relatione. It is a mere assumption that the learned judges decided them on the ground that the whole cause of action arose within the jurisdiction. Sichel v. Borch has been since decided, and I think rightly decided.—p. 343.

special language of sect. 18 of the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, and in which it was held, distinguishing "a cause of action" from "the cause of action," that "a cause of action" there did not mean the whole cause of action, but the act on the part of the defendant which gave the plaintiff his cause of action.—p. 583.

SIR M. SMITH (for self, SIR B. PEACOCK and SIR R. COLLIER).—The learned counsel for the appellants strongly relied on a decision of the Court of C. P. [Ingate v. Austrian Lloyd's Co.], which held that the 19th section of the English Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, enabling a person "residing out of the jurisdiction of the Courts, and not being a British subject," to be personally served, does not apply to foreign corporations carrying on their business abroad.
Whatever may be the authority of this case upon the construction of the English Procedure Act, it ought not, in their lordships' view, to govern their decision in construing the 19th section of the Jamaica Procedure Law. It is to be observed that the 19th section of the English Act is analogous to, but by no means identical with, the 20th section of the Jamaica Procedure Law, and relates to personal and not to substituted service.

COTTON, L.J.—In that case the application was for the renewal of a writ which the plaintiff had neglected to renew in due time, and which had ceased to be in force through his own negligence. There the right of action was gone, and the Court held that as the right of action had gone by the default of the plaintiff, it would be wrong to give him an opportunity of reviving that which he had already lost. Here the right of action still continues, and we are only asked to make the action effectual by ordering service out of the jurisdiction.—p. 648.

But a common money bond under the statute of Anne [4 & 5 Anne c. 16] is a very different thing.—p. 13.

JESSEL, M.R.—As regards the decisions, I agree

they are entirely contradictory to each other. There is, first of all, the decision . . . in Davis v. Spence, in which Brett, Grove and Lindley, JJ. all agree that it is quite clear that the rule, in effect, adopts the practice under the Bills of Exchange Act, and that the leave to read the affidavit in reply was properly given: and they refused the motion to prevent the plaintiff from signing final judgment. On the other hand, we have North Central Waggon Co. v. North Wales Waggon Co., a more recent decision, and in which Davis v. Spence seems to have been cited. . . . It is a distinct decision the other way. Therefore, the result is that the authorities are in conflict: and being decisions of Courts of co-ordinate jurisdiction, I am not bound by either of them.—p. 177.

HALL, V.-C.—Lloyd's Banking Co. v. Oyle has been much relied upon, because it was the case of a guarantor, and the argument founded on it was this, that a guarantor might say: "I shall not pay until I have investigated the state of the accounts between the creditor and the principal debtor. I am not satisfied what the state of the account is, and, under those circumstances, I claim the right to defend." Now the general observations made by Bramwell, L.J., in that case, must be taken with reference to the particular question before him, and I think his language itself, if rightly understood, shows that he meant that. But there what was guaranteed was not, as in the present case, certain promissory notes—the amount found on an account taken and ascertained—but it was the guarantee of the balance upon a banking account, which balance had to be taken, and under those circumstances, the party having sworn the proper affidavit in that respect as to his defence, Bramwell, L.J., said: "If the plaintiffs had sworn that the debt had been admitted by the company, and that the defendant had been informed of the amount and had not dissented or in any other way denied his liability, it would seem to me that he could only defend the action for the purpose of delay, and such an order as that appealed against might be made; but where a guarantor bond fide says that he does not know that the debt is due, and that he requires it to be proved, I think the statute was not intended to operate to take that right from him." He afterwards says: "In my opinion it ought to be a general rule that where there is no acknowledgment of the debt by the defendant, or anything else to show that the defence is for mere purposes of delay in the case of a guarantor or surety, like the defendant, he should not be prevented from going to trial." "A guarantor like the defendant;" that is to say, not a guarantor for payment of certain promissory notes of a fixed amount; the very object of getting promissory notes being to prevent disputes as to amounts and to put the holder of those notes in a position to enforce them at the time they become due.—p. 198.

BRETT, M.R.—Hodsoll v. Baxter, which was cited during the argument, was decided upon the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, s. 25, and therefore ought to be treated as a decision upon Ord. III. r. 6. As the Ex. Ch. was a Court of co-ordinate jurisdiction with our own, the judgment is binding upon us, and we must hold that the order giving leave to sign final judgment under Ord. XIV. was right. But if no authority had existed, I should have come to the same conclusion.—p. 303. BAGGALLAY and BOWEN, L.JJ. concurred.

KAY, J.—I must take that as a decision that where the money to be paid by the third party or co-defendant is under another and different contract, and is not necessarily the same as is payable under the contract sued upon by the plaintiff—but may be less or more—it is not a case of indemnity.—p. 167.

XVI. r. 18 of those rules [of 1875], to the effect that such a notice [i.e. a third party notice] should be served "according to the rules relating to writs of summons," empowered the Court to allow service of such a notice out of the jurisdiction. That provision as to the service of third party notices is reproduced in terms in Ord. XVI. r. 48 of the rules of 1883. . . . The third party in Swansea Shipping Co. v. Duncan was a company carrying on business in Scotland, but there was no exception in the rules of 1875 to the service of writs out of the jurisdiction in favour of persons ordinarily resident in Scotland, corresponding to that which is to be found in the rules of 1883. A similar point arose after the rules of 1883 came into force, in Speller v. Bristol Steam Navigation Co. (supra), where leave was sought to serve a third party notice out of the jurisdiction on a person ordinarily resident in Scotland, on the suggested ground that he was a "proper party" to the action within the meaning of Ord. XI. r. 1 (g). The Court there held that they had no power to give such leave, and that sub-s. (g) of the rule did not apply to third party notices. That decision is not in any way in conflict with the decision in Swansea Shipping Co. v. Duncan, and is no authority against the present application.—p. 341. DAY, J. concurred.

ESHER, M.R.—I think Schneider v. Batt shows, in the first place, that, if the judge refuses to give directions [under Ord. XVI. r. 52], he thereby dismisses the third party from being a third party to the action. . . . It appears to me to follow from that case that, by refusing to give directions, the judge strikes the third party, as such, out of the action, leaving him, of course, a simple defendant, where he is one of the defendants. Another result of Schneider v. Butt seems to me to be this. The general scope of the third party procedure is to deal with cases where, by applying it, all the disputes arising out of a transaction as between the plaintiff and the defendant, and between the defendant and a third party, can be tried and settled in the same action. In a case where there will remain a dispute arising out of the transaction which cannot be tried in the same action, but must form the subject of another action, so that in the result there must be two actions, the judge will rightly exercise his discretion by declining to give directions.—p. 593.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The Court there laid down that the rule [Ord. XVI. r. 48] only applies to cases where the third party was under some obligation, by contract or otherwise, to indemnify the defendant against the demand of the plaintiff. This construction is, in my opinion, warranted by the history of the rule, by its language, and by the forms referred to in it.—p. 461.

LOPES, J.J.—I agree with what was laid down in Birmingham and District Land Co. v. L. & N. W. Ry., viz., that to bring a case within the rule there must be a direct right to indemnity as such, a right which can be enforced either at law or in equity.—p. 462.

ELLENBOROUGH, C.J. (for the Court).—For the reasons already given, it appears to us that Yate v. Willan cannot be supported in its full extent; for although the payment of money in that case did admit the contract as stated in the declaration, it did not admit a contract incompatible with the restrictive provision as to the amount of damages to be recovered in case of loss, which existed in that case, and also in this.—p. 570.

BEST, C.J.—I understood that in Gutteridge v. Smith it had been decided by the Court of C.P. that when a tender was pleaded there could not be a nonsuit, but the defendant must have a verdict. I find that no other judge says anything on this point with Heath, J. The case in Campbell was also decided by the same learned judge. No man can entertain a higher respect for the opinion of any judge than I do for that of Heath, J. If there was anything like a defect in the comprehensive and accurate mind of that excellent man, it was that it could not easily descend to the consideration of such points as that now to be decided. It was the practice to call the plaintiff in every case; if he did not answer no verdict could be given against him. At this day, if the plaintiff's counsel informs the Court, whilst the jury are considering their verdict, that the plaintiff does not appear, a nonsuit is entered. Can there, then, be anything but a nonsuit, when, instead of disappearing just before the end of the case, he does not appear at all? It is said that when there is a tender he takes something by his writ; so he does, if money be paid into Court and he takes it out, and it has been often held that a plaintiff may be nonsuited after payment of money into Court.—p. 291.

STIRLING, J.—The practice of pleading a payment into Court, with a denial of liability, is of recent origin. It first arose under Ord. XXX.

of the Orders in the schedule to the Judicature Act, 1875. That Order did not expressly permit a payment into Court when there was a denial of liability, but the practice was established by the decision of the C. A. in Berdan v. Greenwood. The subsequent Orders of 1883 recognise the practice and contain provisions with respect to it. It is admitted in the case mentioned above, and has subsequently been remarked, that there is a want of logical consistency in allowing a defendant to say in one and the same breath that the plaintiff has no claim and yet to offer a sum in satisfaction—Emden v. Carte (1881) 19 Ch. D. 311.—C.A.; supra, col. 2346). In truth, the practice is a concession to practical convenience at the expense of logic, and under such circumstances difficulties may easily arise as to the effect of it.—p. 509.

LINDLEY, M.R.—I cannot help thinking, so far as the working out of these rules is concerned, that the view taken by Cotton, L.J., in Berdan v. Greenwood, is right. That is to say, if the plaintiff goes on with this action for an injunction, or if the defendant goes on, and the plaintiff succeeds in establishing his right, there is no reason why he should not get the costs of that controversy.—p. 513.

Fleming v. Dollar (1889) 23 Q. B. D. 388; 58 L. J. Q. B. 548; 61 L. T. 230; 37 W. R. 684. HAWKINS, J.—By Ord. XXX. r. 1 of the rules of 1875, according to the decision in Hawkesley v. Bradshaw, it was competent for a defendant even in an action of libel to deny liability and at the same time to pay money into Court. To meet that obvious inconvenience Ord. XXII. r. 1 of the present rules was made. . . . That gives liberty to a defendant in an action for a debt or damages, except in actions for libel or slander, to pay money into Court with a denial of liability; but in libel and slander payment of money into Court with a denial of liability was stopped by this rule.—p. 393.

BOWEN, L.J.—It is too late now to ask us to reconsider the decision in Goutard v. Carr, but I may say that I have no doubt that it is correct. . . . The result of the decision in Goutard v. Carr is, that variations in the form of expression in the defence do not destroy the effect of the fact of bringing the money into Court.—Id.

FRY, L.J.—I think the present case is governed by Goutard v. Carr. The principle of that decision is that payment into Court, so far as that portion of the defence is concerned, is an admission of liability.—Id.

The law upon the subject now is, that where money is paid into Court upon the general indebitatus counts, the payment only amounts to an admission that the defendant is liable, in respect of some contract, to the extent of the sum so paid in; but that where the plaintiff declares upon a special contract, a payment into Court admits such contract.—p. 875.

HERSCHELL, L.C.—In Freeman v. Cox, the late Sir G. Jessel, when M.R., said: "I will make a precedent. It seems to me that the principle on which the Court has ordered payment of money into Court has been that the defendant must admit that the money is in his hands for the purposes of the application. In Jervis v. White (supra), Lord Eldon took the affidavit of the plaintiff, charging the defendant with having a sum of money in his hands, and an affidavit of the defendant before answer, together, as an admission, and ordered the money to be paid into Court. Here we have the affidavit of the plaintiff and the service of the notice of motion upon the defendant. This, I think, is a sufficient admission, the principle being to make the defendant pay into Court what he does not dispute to be owing from him." That seems to me to lay down a clear, sound principle, and beyond that I, for my part, am not disposed to go. But if there is a question whether the money is owing or not, then the matter does not come within what I have read from the judgment of the late M.R. in Freeman v. Cox.—p. 515.

NORTH, J.—It does seem to me that these cases have modified the practice that was adopted, and that to a certain extent it may be an answer to a motion for an order to pay money into Court to say that the money is not in hand. I do not think that they go quite so far as is said—namely, that a man who has received money, which, if he had it hand to-day, he would be ordered to pay into Court, can get off by stating that he paid it yesterday to somebody to whom he had no title to pay it, and who had no title to receive it.—p. 813.

CHITTY, L.J.—With regard to the authorities, I would refer to Gilbert v. Endean, in which Malins, V.-C. heard an application by the plaintiff for leave to proceed against the defendant on the following grounds: The defendant had submitted to a decree; a compromise was subsequently entered into under which the plaintiff agreed to accept a certain sum from the defendant payable by instalments, upon the representation that the defendant was penniless and quite unable to pay the claim against him. The V.-C. gave the plaintiff liberty to enforce the decree notwithstanding the agreement for the compromise, upon the ground that the plaintiff had been induced to enter into the compromise by the representations of the defendant, and in granting that leave in effect set aside the compromise. The C. A. affirmed his decision, saying that as the parties had allowed the V.-C. to determine the case, no objection could afterwards be taken on the ground that the application itself was not the proper mode of procedure. To my mind that case shows that the County Court Judge had jurisdiction over his own judgment.—p. 450.

BLACKBURN, J.—Then there is a more material thing to consider; and that is, have we, although we see the action is utterly groundless, a right to stop it summarily? I grant that is a jurisdiction which in all cases should be very carefully exercised by the Court. But in Castro v. Murray, which was a stronger case than this, the Court of Ex. stayed an action against a public officer charging him with not performing a public duty, the action being absolutely without foundation. In the present case, although the declaration is freely sprinkled over with such words as "malice," "fraud," "combination," and the like, the substance of the action is that the defendants held a court of inquiry in obedience to her Majesty's commands, as a military tribunal, and made a report. No action can lie against them for that: Dawkins v. Rokeby (Lord), in the H. L., which is similar in its circumstances, has determined the precise point.—p. 502.

MALINS, V.-C.—There [Castro v. Murray] the well-known claimant to the Tichborne property brought an action against Mr. Murray, the clerk of the Petty Bag office in the Court of Chancery, for not sealing a writ of error. The defendant did not plead, but applied for and obtained an order at chambers, staying all further proceedings in the action, on the ground that it was frivolous and vexatious, and an abuse of the process of the Court. . . . In Dawkins v. Saxe-Weimar (Prince) the ground of the decision was not only that the defendants were public officers, acting in the due course of their duty as members of a military court of enquiry, but also that the action was utterly groundless, and never could succeed.—pp. 347, 348.

JESSEL, M.R.—Notwithstanding what has been said about Cox v. Mitchell, I am of opinion that there is such a jurisdiction in this Court, and that it is part of the general jurisdiction of the Court to prevent a defendant being improperly vexed by legal procedure. I see no reason on principle why, if the Court is satisfied that the defendant is being improperly vexed, the mere fact of one of the actions being in this country and one in a foreign country, should prevent the Court protecting the defendant from being so improperly vexed. So much for the general jurisdiction. Now I am not sure that what I have stated really conflicts with the judgment of the Court of C. P. in Cox v. Mitchell. In one view it does not so conflict. If the true view of the judgment is that prima facie a man is not doubly vexed when the action is brought in the two countries, but that you want a special case to show that he is doubly vexed, then there is no conflict of opinion. If, however, it means that in no case can the Court interfere, then I must admit, with the greatest deference to the four learned judges who decided Cox v. Mitchell, I should not be prepared to indorse their opinion. . . . At the time when that case [Dillon (Lord) v. Alvares] was decided a judgment in Ireland could not be enforced in England, nor could a judgment in England be enforced in Ireland. That is not so now.—p. 399.

COTTON, L.J.—Possibly what the judges in

Cox v. Mitchell may have meant to decide was this, that where both the actions are in England, in the Queen's Courts in England, or under the present law in Scotland or Ireland, it would be a matter of course to stay one of them, merely from the fact that there is the litigation between the same parties about the same matter, but that where one of the actions is abroad, then it is not of course but it is a matter of discretion, having regard to the circumstances of the case, whether the Court, having jurisdiction, is willing to interfere.—p. 406.

BOWEN, L.J.—I think that Cox v. Mitchell . . . simply lays down the proposition, that the mere pendency of an action abroad is not a sufficient reason for staying an action at home, although the causes of action and the parties may be the same. So understood, it seems to me to be common sense. . . . At present I think that case [Dillon (Lord) v. Alvares] can no longer be cited as conclusive law.—p. 408.

FRY, L.J.—It is not necessary to refer to the earlier authorities, because in Carron Iron Co. v. Maclaren, which was decided in 1855, Lord St. Leonards in the H. It is true that the other learned lords differed from Lord St. Leonards on the facts of the case, but they did not dissent from the principle of law which he laid down. The principle appears to me to have been followed in subsequent cases.—p. 524.

Woodhead* a somewhat litigious plaintiff having got liberty to attend the proceedings in one action, in which he could raise and have disposed of the question which he raised in another, was anxious to continue this action also, and, of course, there the Court stopped him from so doing. In Serrao v. Noel the only question was whether a man might, as Mr. Warrington has described it, split his relief, and having a right to an injunction and damages in respect of the same cause of action, first bring an action for the injunction, and then afterwards for damages; and the only point discussed in the judgment was whether the Court before whom the injunction came was competent to award damages; and, as the Court came to the conclusion that that might have been done, it followed that it ought to have been done, and so the second action could not be allowed.—p. 308.

Sligo it was held that, in order to judge whether the same questions were at issue in the first action as in the second, the Court would look at the proceedings in the first action. LINDLEY, L.J.—The decisions in Youngs, In re, and Neal, In re, can, therefore, no longer be supported as correct according to the present practice. The old doctrine, then, that non-payment of costs is a contempt being abolished, there cannot be a stay of proceedings by reason of mere non-payment. That was the view taken by this Court in Wickham, In re. The principle applicable is the same in the Ch. D. as in the Q. B. D.; the fact that a plaintiff has been ordered to pay costs, and has not paid them because he is unable to do so, is not a sufficient reason for ordering a stay of proceedings.—p. 667.

LOPES, L.J.—The principle of Wickham, In re, as I understand it, is this—that if the action itself is vexatious, or if the plaintiff in his mode of conducting it acts vexatiously and oppressively towards the defendant, then the Court has jurisdiction to stay the proceedings till the plaintiff has paid the costs which he has been ordered to pay.—Ibid.

PARKE, B.—I think this rule ought to be discharged, because the objection that the plaintiff was at all events entitled to nominal damages, was not taken at the trial. Had that point been raised we should have had to consider a question which must soon be determined, viz., whether a payment admitted by the particulars must be pleaded. Had it not been for the decision of the Court of C. P., in Ernest v. Brown, I should have had little or no doubt upon the subject. Before that case I entertained a strong opinion, and so expressed it in Coates v. Stevens, that such a payment need not be pleaded. I thought that the particulars were given to the defendant to enable him to know what to plead, as well as to restrain the plaintiff's proof of the claim in his declaration. In that view I agree with the decision of Patteson, J., in Booth v. Howard, that the particulars are for the benefit of the defendant. It is said that in Ernest v. Brown a distinction was taken between debt and assumpsit with reference to this point. I cannot understand that distinction, nor am I at present satisfied that my first impression on this point, which I expressed in Coates v. Stevens, was wrong.—p. 767.

WILDE, B.—Nelson v. Ogle . . . lays down no fixed rule. It appears, there, that the plaintiff was a foreigner, that he had no fixed place of abode, that he was never resident in any particular place longer than while his ship was in port, and the Court say that his case is not distinguishable from that of an English sailor. Mr. James comes to the conclusion that the ship was a foreign ship; I cannot draw the same conclusion. That case seems to me to leave the question exactly where it was before. A seafaring man may not, strictly speaking, have a home anywhere, unless it be his ship or the port his ship belongs to. The home of a sailor navigating a foreign ship is probably a foreign port.—p. 152. MARTIN and CHANNELL, BB. concurred.

In the first place it is said that only one of the plaintiffs has arrived within the jurisdiction—but if when the action was originally brought one plaintiff had been within the jurisdiction and the others abroad it is admitted that the Court could not have ordered the plaintiffs to give security for costs; and if that be so, it seems to make very little difference that the plaintiff who is within the jurisdiction came to England after the writ was filed. I do not think the distinction is sufficient. In the second place it is said that Redondo v. Chaytor only applies where one of the plaintiffs is within the jurisdiction when the application for security for costs is made: whereas here the plaintiff Ebrard was abroad when the application was made to the V.-C., but has come to England before the appeal was heard. But I think it cannot be maintained that there is a hard and fast rule that a plaintiff can only take advantage of the rule in Redondo v. Chaytor, if at the very moment when the application is made he is within the jurisdiction. As Fry, L.J. suggested in the course of the argument, the true test must be whether he is in England when the judgment is given. I sympathise with what Bramwell, L.J.

said in Redondo v. Chaytor as to the apparent injustice of the general rule, but it is better to keep to the old ways than to make a new practice from moment to moment.—p. 236.

FRY, L.J.—I am of the same opinion, but I have come to that conclusion not without reluctance. I bow to the decision in Redondo v. Chaytor, and I can see no real distinction between that case and the present.—Ibid.

Lake v. Heseltine (1885) 55 L. J. Q. B. 205.

HUDDLESTON, B.—The cases lay down this principle—that if the cause of action which is set up in the counter-claim is in substance a different cause of action to that which is set up in the statement of claim in the action, the defendant may be called upon to give security for costs. The decision of the C. A. in Winterfield v. Bradnum supports this view, though the circumstances of that case do not precisely correspond with those we find here. In his judgment in that case Brett, L.J. said: "A counter-claim is sometimes a mere set-off; sometimes it is in the nature of a cross-action; sometimes it is in respect of a wholly independent transaction. I think the true mode of considering the claim and counter-claim is that they are wholly independent suits which, for the convenience of procedure, are combined in one action." When Mapleson v. Masini was decided, Field and Manisty, JJ. laid down the rule that the different claims must arise out of a similar set of circumstances, and in that case the matters in dispute did arise out of the same transaction. In Sykes v. Sacerdoti the Court held that a defendant who had delivered a counter-claim for negligence on the part of the plaintiff was liable to give security. We do not stop to consider if the present case is on all fours with Winterfield v. Bradnum, for in that case the question before the Court was whether the defendant was entitled to security in respect of his counter-claim, he having admitted the plaintiff's claim. If in our judgment the counter-claim in this case constitutes a fresh cause of action, the defendant must give security.—p. 206. WILLS, J. concurred.

ESHER, M.R.—The rule laid down by the cases seems to be as follows. Where the counter-claim is put forward in respect of a matter wholly distinct from the claim, and the person putting it forward is a foreigner resident out of the jurisdiction, the case may be treated as if that person were a plaintiff, and only a plaintiff, and an order for security for costs may be made accordingly, in the absence of anything to the contrary. Where, however, the counter-claim is not in respect of a wholly distinct matter, but arises in respect of the same matter or transaction upon which the claim is founded, the Court will not, merely because the party counter-claiming is resident out of the jurisdiction, order security for costs; it will in that case consider whether the counter-claim is not in substance put forward as a defence to the claim, whatever form in point of strict law and of pleading it may take, and, if so, what under all the circumstances will be just and fair as between the parties; and will act accordingly. Therefore, the Court in that case will have a discretion.—p. 562.

BRAMWELL, B.—Tenant v. Brown is inconsistent with the general practice in such matters as I am acquainted with it, namely, that the plaintiff must be both suing on behalf of another person and insolvent to entitle the defendant to security for costs. I think the decision in that case must have turned in some way upon the fact that the person on whose behalf the action was really brought was the attorney in the cause. It will be observed that the rule as reported in that case was for staying proceedings until the "plaintiff's attorney," not the "plaintiff," should give security for costs.—p. 290.

BAGGALLAY, L.J.—It is singular that from the time of the decision in Denston v. Ashton (supra), in 1869, this point was not raised again till Pooley's Trustee v. Whetham in 1884. It appears to me that Denston v. Ashton and United Ports and General Insurance Co. v. Hill lay down a rule which has always been acted upon by the Court of Chancery. It is said that here we are dealing with an exception from the general rule. But the rule is that any one may sue without giving security, in any but certain excepted cases. Until lately, security was never required in Chancery unless the plaintiff was abroad, and if there were two co-plaintiffs, one of whom only was abroad, security was not ordered. In Sykes v. Sykes (supra) the circumstances were peculiar. The plaintiffs were two executors, one of whom was out of the jurisdiction, and the other a bankrupt. If the one abroad had been the sole plaintiff, security would have been ordered, if the one in England had been solvent it would not. It was held that the bankruptcy of the one in England made no difference. Again, if a trustee in bankruptcy or liquidation is the sole plaintiff, he will not be ordered to give security: Pooley's Trustee v. Whetham. But in that case an additional point was raised, whether the personal insolvency of the trustee was not a ground for ordering security. The evidence of insolvency broke down, and that point was not decided. Two propositions, then, are established—the fact that the plaintiff is a trustee in bankruptcy or liquidation is not a sufficient ground: the fact that the plaintiff is insolvent is not sufficient ground. Here it is said you have a combination of the two, and though neither alone would be sufficient, both together will suffice. I cannot come to that conclusion. It is said that Lord Blackburn came to it in Malcolm v. Hodgkinson. He there says: "Where an insolvent person is suing as trustee for another, it has long been the rule to require security for costs." I think that this observation is correctly interpreted by Hall, V.-C., in Carta Para Mining Co., In re, as not referring to a case like that of a trustee in bankruptcy, but to the case of a person who is a bare trustee for some one else. Suppose I, having a shadowy case, assign it over to a man of straw that he may sue for my benefit, then security for costs will be ordered.—p. 37.

LINDLEY, L.J.—But it is contended that the case is covered by Malcolm v. Hodgkinson. In that case security for costs was ordered to be given by a plaintiff, who was a liquidating debtor under the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, and a receiver of whose property had been appointed. This case was apparently followed in Brocklebank v. King's Lynn Steamship Co. (supra), but without argument on the point whether security for costs could be ordered or not. In Carta Para Mining Co., In re, Hall, V.-C. followed those decisions, remarking, however, that they were departures from the old rule. Malcolm

v. Hodgkinson was decided on the ground that the case came within the rule, according to which an insolvent plaintiff suing as trustee for another can be required to give security for costs. But, as pointed out in Carta Para Mining Co., In re, by Hall, V.-C., and by this Court in Concell v. Taylor, this rule only applies where the nominal plaintiff is not the real plaintiff, but is a person whose name is used by some one behind him. The present case is clearly not a case of that description, and is not within the principle on which the Court appears to have proceeded in Malcolm v. Hodgkinson. If Malcolm v. Hodgkinson, and the two cases in which it was followed, are to be considered as laying down a general rule, that wherever a plaintiff is insolvent and there is a receiver of his assets, the plaintiff can be properly ordered to give security for costs, they go further than any other cases in the books, and cannot be reconciled with United Ports, &c., Co. v. Hill. In that case an unlimited company, ordered to be wound up, brought an action to recover money due to it, and although a liquidator had been appointed, the Court decided that the company could not be ordered to give security for costs. This decision appears to me to have been quite right, and to be inconsistent with any such rule as that which is sought to be deduced from Malcolm v. Hodgkinson.—p. 554. LOPES, L.J. concurred.

ESHER, M.R.—It follows, I think, from what has been held in the C. A., in Rhodes v. Dawson, that the mere fact of bankruptcy is not per se a sufficient reason why a plaintiff should be ordered to give security for costs.—p. 662. FRY, L.J. concurred.

LOPES, L.J.—It seems to me that the question in this case is really answered by the judgment in that case [Rhodes v. Dawson], where a passage from Chitty's Archbold (vol. i., p. 398) is cited with approval, such passage being to the following effect: "The plaintiff will not be compelled to give security for costs merely because he is a pauper, or bankrupt, or insolvent, and this even in a qui tam action; and this rule applies where the plaintiff is a trustee of a bankrupt, and is suing for the benefit of the estate, or where the plaintiff is suing as executor for the benefit of the testator's estate."—p. 662.

Smith, In re, Bain v. Bain (1896) 75 L. T. 46.—C.A. LINDLEY, LOPES and RIGBY, L.JJ.; reversing KEKEWICH, J.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The plaintiff is resident abroad. The defendant does not deny her right to an account as claimed by her, but says that there will be no residuary estate; and he therefore asks for security for his costs of the action. If there was any residuary estate it would not be necessary for the defendant to ask for security, because the costs would come out of the residuary estate. It does not, however, appear that there will be any, and consequently there is no reason for not acting on the general rule. I rather think, reading Kekewich, J.'s judgment, that this is the opinion which he held with regard to the residuary estate, but he took the view that security for costs ought not to be directed to be given after a defendant has delivered his statement of defence. When I look, however, at Ord. LXV. r. 6, and . . . Martano v. Mann and Lydney and Wigpool Iron Ore Co., it seems to me that the Court is not bound by any hard and fast line as to when an order for security for costs can be made.—p. 47.

WICKENS, V.-C., said that the case of Seidler, Ex parte, was one of questionable authority, as it was not to be found in the registrar's book. This question had been considered by the M.R. in Murrow v. Wilson, where it was decided that filing affidavits would not in general waive the right to security for costs, and under the circumstances that judgment must be taken to establish the balance of authority. It was important that such matters should be decided, and on the authority of that case he should hold that the respondents were entitled to security for costs, and on the authority of Latta, Ex parte, the only case to be found upon the subject, he should hold that the amount of such security must be 100%.

DENMAN, J.—The case [Northampton Coal, &c., Co. v. Midland Waggon Co.] is a strong authority for the proposition that there is no discretion where the circumstance exists which admittedly exists in the present case, namely, that the company is in liquidation, and there is nothing to show that the assets will be sufficient.—p. 238.

CHARLES, J.—The M.R. there [City of Moscow

Gas Co. v. International Financial Society] said that security for costs ought always to be ordered where the company is in liquidation, and there is nothing to show that the assets will be sufficient to pay the defendant's costs if he is successful, and in that case, even though there were cross bills, he ordered security for costs to be given, and on appeal James, L.J. took the same view.—p. 238.

DENMAN, J.—Harvey v. Jacob is an express authority upon the point. I see no distinction in principle between that case and the present. Costa Rica Republic v. Erlanger differs in this, that all the circumstances were known to the defendant from the very commencement of the suit; and when Oxenden v. Cropper was cited before Patteson, J., the previous cases were not cited.—p. 367.

LINDLEY, J.—The matter was not argued in Erlanger's Case, and there was a delay of two years there; nor do I think that Ord. LV. has any application to the matter. The rule, as stated in Daniell's Chancery Practice (5th edition), pp. 32, 33, shows that the common form of order is applicable to security for the whole costs, and is not limited to after accruing costs. The practice seems to me to be well settled.—Id.

ALVERSTONE, C.J.—Hodgson v. Bell decided that where a claim indorsed on a writ in an action of contract brought in the High Court exceeds 100%, there is no jurisdiction under [County Courts Act, 1888] s. 65 to order the action to be tried in the county court, though after action brought the claim is reduced by payment below 100%.—p. 676. Bennett v. Bury (Lord) (1880) 5 C. P. D. 339; 49 L. J. C. P. 411; 42 L. T. 480.

COLERIDGE, C.J.—Two objections were urged against this order. First, that it is an entirely novel proceeding, an attempt by plaintiffs to consolidate, and not by defendants. That objection, I think, is answered by Amos v. Chadwick. There seventy-eight actions were brought by different plaintiffs against the same defendants in respect of an alleged misrepresentation in the prospectus of a company; and Malins, V.-C., upon the application of the plaintiffs, ordered that one of the actions should be tried as a representative action, and that the proceedings in the others should be stayed, the plaintiffs in all the other actions undertaking to abide by such order as the Court might think fit to make on the determination of the representative action; and the C.A. . . . held that the questions in all the actions being substantially the same, if all were tried, the order was well made under the general power of the Court to prevent a scandal in the administration of justice.—p. 342. POLLOCK, B.—In Rex v. Bank of England, Lord Mansfield said: "Where there is no specific remedy the Court will grant a mandamus that justice may be done." These words were amplified by Esher, M.R. in the recent case of Nathan, In re, where he said that they meant, "Where there is no specific remedy, and by reason of the want of that specific remedy justice cannot be done unless a mandamus is to go, then a mandamus will go." . . . In Nathan, In re . . . this Court having granted a mandamus to the Commissioners of Inland Revenue to pay to the applicant certain duty which he alleged he had overpaid, the C. A. reversed the decision upon the ground that the proper remedy was by petition of right.—p. 468.

WILLES, J.—With respect to the so-called resolution of the judges in De Rothschild v. Shilston, certainly it is not a rule in so far as it suggests that it is sufficient for the defendant, on an application to change the venue, to state in his affidavit as a ground for the change that the cause of action arose in some other county than that in which the venue had been laid. After that case of De Rothschild v. Shilston, defendants, in practically undefended actions, attempted, but unsuccessfully, for the mere purpose of delay, to obtain an order to change the venue from London, where it had been laid, to some place in the country on an affidavit that the cause of action arose there. That part of the so-called resolution was never adopted, and was not properly a resolution of the judges at all. If it had been adopted it would have been made a rule of Court. There is, however, no such rule.—p. 140.

BAGGALLAY, L.J.—Reference has been made to . . . Cardinal v. Cardinal, the first part of the marginal note of which is in these terms: "An action, which falls within one of the classes of actions which . . . are specially assigned to the Ch. Div. will not be sent for trial by a jury unless it involves a simple issue of fact, the determination of which will decide the action." When I first read that marginal note it occurred to me that that was in effect saying that if the action did involve a simple issue of fact the determination of which would decide the action, it should be sent for trial by a jury. I think, however, that, if fairly interpreted, it only means that unless it involves a simple issue of fact it will not be sent to a jury, but not necessarily that in every case if there is a simple question of fact it will be sent to a jury. When, however, I look at the judgment of the learned judge I think it supports the other interpretation, for I find the learned judge saying, "I do not think it was the intention of the legislature, or of the judges who framed the new rules, that such a case as the present should be tried by a jury. I think the intention was, that if it appeared that there was a simple question of fact, the verdict upon which would decide the issue in the action, it should be sent for trial by a jury." Now, with regard to the case with which the learned judge was dealing, possibly this statement of opinion may be quite right, but I am not prepared to concur in the view that in every case in which there is some simple question of fact which will decide the whole of the matters in issue, it is to be sent to a jury. I can very well imagine a simple issue of fact, arising in an action properly assigned to the Ch. Div., upon which the judge is as capable of deciding as a jury, and as to which it would be an unnecessary expense to have a trial by jury. I think in each case the judge to whom the application is made must be guided by the circumstances.—p. 56.

[This latter case came originally before Jessel, M.R., who said that he thought it right to follow the decision in Clarke v. Cookson, that trials with a jury could not be heard before a judge of the Ch. Div. The C.A. (James, L.J., Baggallay and Bramwell, J.J.A.) affirmed Jessel, M.R., but *Clarke v. BACON, V.-C.—But the judgment of Hall, V.-C. in Garling v. Royds expresses, in my opinion, distinctly the principle upon which the Court must act when it finds that in the case submitted for its decision there are questions of law—minute, serious, important questions of law—mixed up with questions of fact, and that it could not help the Court in the discharge of its plain duty to have findings of fact in the particular circumstances insisted upon by the defendant, but only evade or at least baffle the plaintiff in his attempt to obtain what he says is his right.—p. 649.

MALINS, V.-C.—In Back v. Hay the defendants were charged with fraudulent misrepresentation in the formation of a company, and I thought that was a case to be decided in this Court. *Pilley v. In those cases I thought it desirable that they should be tried here, because from the nature of the cases they had always been within the jurisdiction of this Court, and I thought it was the proper tribunal.—p. 514.

JESSEL, M.R.—Then the next point to be considered is, in what cases does the Court interfere with the discretion of a judge who has directed a case to be tried either with or without a jury? He having that discretion, I take it there must be a plain and clear case to justify the C. A. in interfering, for, as a general rule, the Court does not interfere with the exercise of the discretion of the judge. There must be some special reason to induce it to do so. And here I wish to make an observation about the judgment of the late James, L.J., in Ruston v. Tobin. I am satisfied that, whether his words there are correctly reported or not, he did not intend to decide (I was sitting with him at the time, and I know there was no difference of opinion between us) that in no case should the Court interfere, and I am sure he did not intend to overrule or interfere with his own decision in Golding v. Wharton Saltworks Co. ((1876) 1 Q. B. D. 374.—C.A., see post, col. 2496), in which he said the Court would interfere if there was serious injustice. In addition to that, there is another remark by James, L.J., in that case of Ruston v. Tobin, with regard to another case in which the Court will interfere, and that is, where the discretion has been exercised in a particular way, in consequence of an opinion on a point of law which the C. A. thinks to be a wrong opinion.—p. 369. COTTON and LINDLEY, L.JJ. concurred.

COTTON, L.J.—In the case of The Temple Bar we held, and as I think rightly, for reasons which I need not repeat, that r. 6 [Ord. XXXVI.] deals only with causes and matters not mentioned in the preceding rules.—p. 75.

LINDLEY, L.J.—As I said in The Temple Bar, the rules 2—7 of Ord. XXXVI. form a group of regulations hanging together and requiring to be read together. They form a new set of regulations as to trial by jury, and we should only be misled if we were to go back to decisions on the Orders of 1875. . . . It. 6 gives no right to trial by jury in any case which before could be tried without a jury, without any consent of parties: The Temple Bar. The actions now before us are actions for nuisance in the Ch. Div. These before the Judicature Acts would be tried by a judge without a jury, unless he saw fit to direct them to be tried with a jury. They come within r. 7 (a).—pp. 76—77.

BOWEN, L.J.—I think we are bound by the decision in The Temple Bar, to hold that the applicants cannot claim a trial by jury as a matter of right.—p. 77.

LINDLEY, L.J.—We were pressed with Jenkins v. Bushby. The Solicitor-General there urged that the plaintiffs had a right to a trial by jury; that was decided against him. He then urged that there would be a miscarriage of justice unless there was a trial by a jury who could have a view. We thought that a view was essential to justice, and on that ground we interfered. Here I can see no reason to apprehend a failure of justice if the case is tried in the way which North, J. thinks the best.—p. 533.

LINDLEY, L.J.—When we look at the rules and refer back to the exposition of them given in a case about which we took considerable trouble, Jenkins v. Bushby, we find that it is now settled that the expression “in any other cause or matter” in r. 6 [Ord. XXXVI.] refers to all causes and matters not previously referred to. Amongst those causes or matters previously referred to are causes or matters which previously to the passing of the principal Act—that is, the Judicature Act, which came into operation in 1875—“could without any consent of parties have been tried without a jury." If once you find that this is such a cause or matter, then the rule prima facie applicable to it is r. 7, which says that cases of that description are to be tried by a judge without a jury, unless otherwise ordered.—p. 410.

BLACKBURN, J. (for the Court).—To substitute for the word "trial" the words "taking of the verdict," or any similar words, or to construe the word "trial" as limited to the "taking of the verdict," would be an alteration and straining of the words of the legislature for the purpose of defeating their obvious intention. We have no doubt that we cannot do so, and we should not have thought it necessary to render our reasons so much at length were it not for the expressions used by Tindal, C.J., in the opinion delivered by him in O'Connell v. Reg., which certainly are an authority to the contrary. It is to be remembered how that opinion came to be delivered. The Court of Q. B. in Ireland had, under the Irish Act, which is identical in its terms with the English Act, appointed days in the vacation after Hilary Term for the trial of that cause. On one of those days the jury delivered in a long special finding on the issues, and on this finding many troublesome questions arose. Had the verdict been delivered on a day which actually as well as constructively fell in Hilary Term, the Court of Q. B. might, and on such findings probably would, have postponed sentence until those points were argued, and for that purpose have adjourned the cause till next term. Nor can any reasonable doubt be entertained that in point of fact the Court of Q. B. in Ireland did, on receiving these findings, declare that they would do so, for on the first day of the next term, Easter Term, the parties did appear, motions were made on their behalf in arrest of judgment and otherwise, and after long arguments, sentence was pronounced in Trinity Term.

But when the record was made up and returned in obedience to the writ of error, all that appeared on the record was that these special findings were taken on the 12th of February, being one of the days which, by virtue of the statute, were for the purposes of the trial to be deemed part of Hilary Term, and that on the 15th of April, being the first day of the ensuing Easter Term, the parties appeared, and that having done so, and taken various steps in the cause, it was continued into Trinity Term, in which the sentence was passed. The counsel for the defendants assigned thirty-three grounds of error, some of which were very serious, and on one of which the judgment was reversed. But many were frivolous, and amongst those was the twentieth objection, "that there was not any proper continuance from the time when the verdict was given to the following Term, when the judgment was pronounced." The H. L. had to determine for the first time whether this objection was good, and whatever might have been the judgment if there had been a long series of precedents determining that the absence of a formal entry was fatal, it is obvious that there could be but one decision when it was a case of the first impression. The House thought fit to ask the judges amongst other questions, whether this was a good ground for reversing the judgment. The unanimous answer of the judges, delivered by Tindal, C.J., was that it was not, and the judgment of the House was that it was not. But in delivering the reasons for that judgment, Tindal, C.J. does undoubtedly, at p. 250 of the report, state as the ground of his opinion that the day appointed was a day in Term for the purpose of the trial, which no one doubts; but he assumes that the trial means in this statute the taking of the verdict and nothing more. He gives no reasons for this assumption; it had not been argued at the bar of the House, and it evidently was not much considered. If this was part of the ratio decidendi of the Lords in that case, we should be obliged to submit to it. But the opinions of the judges rendered to the House are but advice to assist the House, as was strongly shown in that very case, where the Lords by a majority of one gave judgment contrary to the opinions of a great majority of the judges. But though not binding on us, the opinion of such an eminent lawyer as Tindal, C.J., is to be treated with great respect, and the more so as all the other judges subscribed to his opinion, giving this as a reason. We should not, therefore, presume to dissent from that opinion if it were not that we find this point was not argued, and the opinion seems to have been hastily adopted without considering the reasons, which we think would have brought those learned persons to an opposite opinion, and which certainly lead us, without any doubt, to hold that the sentence was in this case properly pronounced.—p. 111.

JESSEL, M.R.—The object of the Judicature Act was to try all disputes together, and it was considered a beneficial object. Separate trials of separate issues are nearly as expensive as separate actions, and ought certainly not to be encouraged, and they should only be granted on special grounds. Consider for a moment three illustrations I gave in Emma Silver Mining Co. v. Grant, when I directed an issue to be tried. The first case was that of a lady who alleged that she was the legitimate child of somebody, and as such entitled to an account, but her legitimacy was denied. If the plaintiff was legitimate, her right to an account was not contested, but the cost of taking the account would have been enormous, so that if I had directed the account in the first instance and decided the legitimacy afterwards, the whole costs would have been thrown away. Therefore it was essential to decide the question of legitimacy first. It was not a case really for directing an issue for the trial as distinguished from trying the action. If the case had come on in the regular way, the only question to be tried would have been legitimacy. It was expediting the trial on the only question that could be tried. The two next cases were very peculiar. The one was an heir-at-law case, in which the plaintiff was a pauper with a fishing action, a very special case indeed, and there was evidence—strong evidence, and it turned out to be satisfactory evidence—that the plaintiff had no claim at all. I have no such evidence here. As I said before, I cannot tell by the affidavits who is right and who is wrong. There is a statement by one side met by a contradictory statement on the other. One cannot say in this case that there is prima facie evidence that the defendant is right upon the issue, as there was in that case. The third case was still more remarkable, because it was not only a pauper plaintiff, but a pauper set up by other persons to sue on his and their behalf, and in that case, no doubt, it would have been an enormously expensive action to try. The simple question was whether he was a tenant of the manor or not. The defendant produced the Court rolls, and showed that his name was not entered as tenant. There was the strongest prima facie evidence that he was not tenant; I therefore thought it right first to put him to the proof that he was tenant, but he failed to prove it, and there was an end of the action. Here there is a conflict of testimony, and I have no means of forming an opinion as to which is right and which is wrong. I think that the application of the rule should be limited to extraordinary and exceptional cases, and I think Emma Silver Mining Co. v. Grant was an extraordinary and exceptional case.—p. 479.

BRETT, J.A.—I wish to mention that in a case which came before us a short time ago [Lloyd v. Lewis] I used the words "crotchety technicality," and I am told that I have been supposed to have used those words with respect to the decisions of some of the judges. I had no such intention, and what I said related to no particular person engaged in the case, but to crotchety persons who from time to time suggest technical subtleties in construing these rules. I said, speaking as of a rule of construction, that this Court ought to discourage these attempts, my notion being, that these rules should be construed broadly, so as to avoid technical difficulties.—p. 73.

- A. L. SMITH, L.J.—In that case the plaintiff, in an action where the venue was Middlesex, gave ten days' notice of trial for the Liverpool Assizes. The Court held that that notice was a nullity, and that an order that the notice should stand made after the giving of the notice of trial, but at such a time that the notice was not a ten days' notice, could not stand. The notice of trial there was in effect only a seven days' notice. That case does not decide that the Court could not order a ten days' notice of trial before trial. . . . The judge may order that the notice of trial may be given for the first day of the Assizes, but that the case shall not come on for trial until ten days after the notice of trial. That is what the order here does.—p. 155.

MAULE, J. to the same effect.

CRESSWELL, J.—Goodtitle v. Braham (supra) has never been supported to the extent there ruled. In such a case now there can be no question that the defendant would not be entitled to the general reply, but still that case may be considered law, so far as deciding that, in a question between heir-at-law and devisee, if the heirship be admitted, the devisee begins; that means, it must be admitted that the plaintiff is heir-at-law up to the time of the death. In Doe v. Tucker (post) the defendant would not admit that the seisin of the ancestor continued up to the time of the death; an intervening conveyance was set up; and, consequently, the defendant was not allowed to begin.—p. 132.

PARKE, B.—One of the first cases on this subject was Huckman v. Fernie, where Lord Abinger is reported to have said: "I cannot say we should interfere in a very doubtful case, but if the decision of the judge were clearly and manifestly wrong, the Court would interfere to set it right." Now that is an inaccuracy; and I have corrected it in my own hand in the copy of Meeson & Welsby which is in this Court. What Lord Abinger said was, that the order of beginning is a matter for the disposal of the judge at Nisi Prius, but if his ruling did clear and manifest wrong the Court would interfere to set it right; and that view of his language is confirmed by the note appended to the report of Edwards v. Matthews in the Jurist.—p. 37.

- WILLS, J.—No doubt most persons would say that the effect of withdrawing a juror was that the cause thereby came to an end, and, popularly speaking, that is a very fair description of the result of such an agreement; in all ordinary cases the juror is withdrawn with the intention that the cause shall, and it does, come to an end. Gibbs v. Ralph is the only case where similar general language is used without qualification, and it is abundantly clear, both upon principle and from the decisions in Burdon v. Flower and Norburn v. Hilliam (post), that the withdrawal of a juror is not a legal determination of the cause, but is only a determination in this sense, that unless something very special happens the Court will hold the parties to their understanding and will stay any further proceedings in the action.—p. 825.

- CHELMSFORD, L.C.—As to Banks v. Newton, my opinion is, that it cannot be sustained. The fact that the defendant could, before judgment, have suggested that which he afterwards alleged as constituting matter of error ought to have precluded him from being heard after the judgment. The case stands alone, and the suggested analogies are misleading. . . . This is a case in which a party, fully competent, had a formal mode of raising the question by way of suggestion before judgment, and has passed by that occasion. He ought, therefore, not to bring error in fact any more than he could do to raise a matter of abatement or bar which he has not pleaded, or of challenge not formally assigned—a course clearly inadmissible. This was not considered in Banks v. Newton, and the reasons for the judgment are not given. The case was very summarily disposed of, and, undoubtedly, the judgment which was given, that the previous judgment should be reversed, was itself incorrect, because the judgment should have been revoked or recalled.—p. 249.

POLLOCK, B.—With regard to the second contention, there is no doubt but that a mistake made by the clerk or officer of a court in entering a verdict or judgment may be amended from the judge's notes. The older authorities are referred to in Com. Dig., Amendment P., and in Marianski v. Cairns, where the finding of issues at a trial had been entered imperfectly, and the Court sent the case back to have the verdict entered according to the substance of the finding with the assistance of the judge, who would be guided by his notes. It is to be observed, however, that this course was so adopted expressly upon the ground that what occurred amounted to a mere mis-entry of the verdict.—p. 353.

A. L. SMITH (for self, LINDLEY and DAVEY, L.JJ.).—The L.C. (Lord Cottenham), in O'Connor v. Malone, said: "It is a well-known rule of law that a verdict without a judgment is no evidence at all, the reason being that there is nothing to show that such verdict has not been set aside or may not have been acted upon by the Court." . . . It appears to us that in ordinary cases, if a verdict be followed by a judgment, and such judgment is afterwards set aside, the verdict falls with the judgment, and, as was held in O'Connor v. Malone, neither party can give such verdict in evidence upon the second trial.—p. 2.

FRY, J.—When Cockle v. Joyce came before me I was at first disposed to think that the defendant need not prove that he had been served with notice of trial. But I was told by the registrar that the practice was to require proof of the service. Lows, Ex parte, however, appears to be a case in point, and upon the authority of that decision I now hold that the defendant need not prove that he has been served with notice of trial, and I give judgment for him with costs.—p. 411.

FRY, J.—I came to that conclusion because I was told by the registrar that the practice was always to require the affidavit. I do not wish to impose on plaintiffs the obligation of proving service of notice of trial, if the other Divisions do not. In the Court of Ch. an affidavit of service of notice of motion for decree was always required.—p. 162.

Bradley* the judges of the High Court have exercised general discretion as to costs in cases not tried before a jury, except in cases falling within the provisions of sects. 7, 8 & 10 of the County Courts Act, 1873.—p. 428.

COCKBURN, C.J.—Myers v. Defries was, therefore, in my opinion, rightly decided, where it was held that, where the plaintiff succeeded in his claim, and the defendant on his counterclaim, the word "event" in Ord. LV. was to be read distributively, and each party was entitled to his costs.—p. 577.

SELBORNE, L.C.—Myers v. Defries shows that an alternative power is vested in the Divisional Court, and that it has a jurisdiction to disallow the costs.—p. 643.

- FARWELL, J.—It is clear that Clause (b) [Public Authorities Protection Act, 1893, s. 1] points only to a case in which the proceedings culminate in a judgment. Upon that clause it was held in Shaw v. Hertfordshire County Council that an order by consent giving leave to enter up judgment is to be regarded as a judgment. And it has also been held that, although the discretion of the Court to deprive a successful litigant of his costs is not fettered in any way—see Bostock v. Ramsey Urban Council—yet that where the Court does not see fit to exercise that discretion, the public body is entitled as of right to costs as between solicitor and client—Fielden v. Morley Corporation (post).—p. 9.

WILLES, J.—In *Smith v. QUAIN, J. (for self and ARCHIBALD, J.).—The principles by which we think the Court should be governed in granting or refusing a new trial in actions of tort, on the ground of insufficiency of damages are not fully explained in the case referred to [Rendall v. Hayward], but are, as we conceive, correctly stated by Blackburn, J. in his judgment in Kelly v. Sherlock, namely, that there is no inexorable rule of practice precluding the granting a new trial on account of smallness of damages, but that where the smallness of the damages shows that the jury have made a compromise, and instead of deciding the issue submitted to them of guilty or not guilty, have agreed to find for the plaintiff for nominal damages only, a new trial will be granted, such a case being in effect as if the jury had been discharged without a verdict.—p. 8.

COCKBURN, C.J. (for self and LOPES, J.).—Generally speaking, we agree with the rule as laid down by Brett, J. in Rowley v. L. & N.W. Ry., an action brought on the 9 and 10 Vict. 93, that a jury in these cases "must not attempt to give damages to the full amount of a perfect compensation for the pecuniary injury, but must take a reasonable view of the case and give what they consider under all the circumstances a fair compensation." . . . But we think that a jury cannot be said to take a reasonable view of the case unless they consider and take into account all the heads of damage in respect of which a plaintiff complaining of a personal injury is entitled to compensation. These are the bodily injury sustained; the pain undergone; the effect on the health of the sufferer according to its degree and its probable duration as likely to be temporary or permanent; the expenses incidental to attempts to effect a cure or to lessen the amount of injury; the pecuniary loss sustained through inability to attend to a profession or business as to which, again, the injury may be of a temporary character, or may be such as to incapacitate the party for the remainder of his life. . . . It was contended, on behalf of the defendants, that even assuming the damages to be inadequate, the Court ought not on that account to set aside the verdict and direct a new trial, inadequacy of damages not being a sufficient ground for granting a new trial in an action of tort, unless there has been misdirection or misconduct in the jury, or miscalculation, in support of which Rendall v. Hayward and Forsdike v. Stone were relied on. But in both those cases the action was for slander, in which, as was observed by the judges in the latter case, the jury may consider, not only what the plaintiff ought to receive, but what the defendant ought to pay. We think the rule contended for has no application in a case of personal injury, and that it is perfectly competent to us if we think the damages unreasonably small to order a new trial at the instance of the plaintiff. There can be no doubt of the power of the Court to grant a new trial where in such an action the damages are excessive. There can be no reason why the same principle should not apply when they are insufficient to meet the justice of the case.—p. 408.

It seems to me that this evidence ought not to have been received, and that having been received, there ought to be a new trial." But there the evidence had been received after the defendant's case was closed, and after the plaintiff's advocate had replied; and this irregularity, testifying that the undersheriff who presided was unduly influenced, appears to have been a ground of the decision.—p. 13.

THE COURT.—We are now come to Chambers v. Robinson, which seems to be the only case wherever a new trial was granted merely for the excessiveness of damages only: we are not satisfied with the reason given in that case, and think it of no weight, and want to know the facts upon which the Court could pronounce the damages to be excessive; the principle on which it was granted, mentioned in Strange, was to give the defendant a chance of another jury; this is a very bad reason, for if it was not it would be a reason for a third and fourth trial, and would be digging up the constitution by the roots, and therefore we are free to say this case is not law; and that there is not one single case (that is law), in all the books to be found, where the Court has granted a new trial for excessive damages in actions for torts.—p. 249.

PARKE, B. (for the Court).—The authority of Doe d. Teynham (Lord) v. Tyler was quoted to show that the Court have a power to refuse a new trial where evidence has been improperly rejected, if in their judgment the rejected evidence ought to have no effect, and there is enough to warrant the verdict against the party on whose behalf that evidence was offered, supposing it to have been admitted. Something to the same effect had fallen from Sir J. Mansfield in 1 Taunt. 14, and from Lord Tenterden in Tyrwhitt v. Wynne (2 B. & Ald. 559, supra). But we cannot help thinking that the rule is there laid down much too generally, and it is obvious that if it were acted upon to that extent, the Court would in a degree assume the province of the jury, and besides its frequent application would cause the rules of evidence to be less carefully considered; and the litigant parties would in all probability have on most occasions recourse to bills of exceptions for the rejection or reception of improper evidence, a course productive of great delay and inconvenience.—p. 932.

(E.); affirming (1885), C.A., which reversed COLERIDGE, C.J. and STEPHEN, J. LORD HALSBURY.—Now I think that the principle laid down in Solomon v. Bitton is erroneous, as reported, in the use of the word "ought." If a Court—not a Court of Appeal in which the facts are open for original judgment, but a Court which is not a Court to review facts at all—can grant a new trial whenever it thinks that reasonable men ought to have found another verdict, it seems to me that they must form and act upon their own view of what the evidence in their judgment proves. That, I think, is not the law. If reasonable men might find (not "ought to" as was said in Solomon v. Bitton) the verdict which has been found, I think no Court has jurisdiction to disturb a decision of fact which the law has confided to juries, not to judges. My noble and learned friend on the woolsack [Herschell, L.C., who had said that the verdict ought not to be disturbed unless it was one which a jury, viewing the whole of the evidence reasonably, could not properly find] has put the proposition in a form which is not open to objection, but which perhaps leaves open for definition in what sense the word "properly" is to be used. I think the test of reasonableness, in considering the verdict of a jury, is right enough, in order to understand whether the jury have really done their duty. If their finding is absolutely unreasonable, a Court may consider that that shows that they have not really performed the judicial duty cast upon them; but the principle must be that the judgment upon the facts is to be the judgment of the jury and not the judgment of any other tribunal. If the word "might" were substituted for "ought" in Solomon v. Bitton, I think the principle would be accurately stated.—p. 155.

ESHER, M.R.—As to Solomon v. Bitton, I took part in the judgment according to the report. There may be some doubt as to the meaning of what was said, but, as Fry, L.J. has informed us, the late M.R. desired the word "not" to be inserted in the opinion attributed to the Court after the words "reasonable men ought." If that is done, the opinion then stated is the same as that of every one else. For the future we shall read this case as if the word "not" were so inserted. We said the same in Metropolitan

Wright*—did not, in my opinion, decide any such proposition as that the Court in Banco should, in coming to a conclusion as to whether a verdict should be set aside on the ground that it was against the weight of evidence, or on the ground that the damages were excessive, leave altogether out of consideration the opinion of the judge who tried the case.—p. 71.

JESSEL, M.R.—We thought [Hunt v. City of London Real Property Co.] that the words "tried in" had been left out by mistake from Ord. XXXIX. r. 1, and we decided that it must be read as if they had been inserted. The old rule contained those words.—p. 276.

JAMES, L.J.—The Court in that case thought that it was absolutely necessary to find some mode in which a new trial in an action originally set down in the Ch. Div. could be obtained, and they could not find any other place except the Common Law Div. Court. It seemed to the Court that that was the reasonable and necessary interpretation of the orders. I concur in that view.—IB. BAGGALLAY, L.J. concurred.

JESSEL, M.R.—It must be understood that our decision does not apply to the case of an issue directed by a judge of the Ch. Div.—p. 277.

COLLINS, M.R. (for self, MATHEW and COZENS-HARDY, L.JJ.).—Having regard to the general rule of practice laid down in Heckscher v. Crosley, and since acted upon, not to grant security for costs in the case of new trial motions, we took time to consult the other members of the Court as to whether the time has not come when that practice should be altered. It has been more than once treated as anomalous—see Harwood v. Abrahams—and, when analysed, it does not seem to rest on any logical basis. . . . All the L.JJ. concur in thinking that we ought not any longer to treat ourselves as bound by the rule laid down in Heckscher v. Crosley.—p. 710.

JESSEL, M.R.—It seems to be established by . . . Doe v. Martin and Belcher v. Magnay, that where a verdict has been found in favour of one defendant and against another, and the defendant against whom the verdict has been found shall move for a new trial, he is bound to serve a notice of the rule for a new trial on the defendant in whose favour the verdict was returned, and no new trial could be granted unless that proceeding was adopted. That seems to me a very reasonable rule and entirely coincides with the similar practice in the Courts of equity.—p. 639.

MELLISH, L.J.—Now the authorities that have been cited seem to show very clearly that under the old practice the Court could not grant a new trial as against one defendant, even in an action of tort, without granting it as to all. That was decided in the two cases which have been referred to by the M.R. In Price v. Harris (supra) the defendant asked for a new trial, and the Court put her under terms; but where one of several defendants got a new trial, it appears the Court had never granted a new trial as against one defendant without granting it as against all, and it was the duty of one defendant to bring the others before the Court.—p. 641. HALSBURY, L.C.—I doubt very much whether Ord. LVIII. r. 4 gives any such jurisdiction as the C. A. claimed to exercise in finding a verdict for themselves, and actually assessing damages for breaking a contract. As I think the judgment of the C. A. was wrong upon the facts, it is not absolutely necessary to determine that question.—p. 747.

BRAMWELL, B.—Peirce v. Derry is relied on as an authority that there is no entry of judgment until the costs have been taxed. There the plaintiff had entered up final judgment as of the day when the original entry was made, and the Court ordered the date of the judgment to be altered to the day of taxation of costs; therefore it was not necessary to consider the statute of Charles (17 Car. 2, c. 8, s. 1). But if they meant to lay down a positive rule that for all purposes there is no judgment until the costs are taxed, that is opposed to the authorities. For the purpose of this statute (15 & 16 Vict. c. 76, s. 139) judgment is signed when the original entry is made.—p. 421.

ROMER, J.—That [case] was under the practice of the Court of Chancery, which had the inherent power of re-trying cases even after the drawing up and passing of the decree. That case only decided that, in the opinion of the then M.R., the Court in the exercise of its discretion would not re-hear the case, after the decree had been entered, on the ground of fraud, but would re-hear it in the case of a mere mistake. That case has no application to the modern practice under the Judicature Acts.—p. 433.

BACON, C.J.—The judgment delivered by Lord Westbury in Hookey, Ex parte, relates not only to the practice of the Court of Bankruptcy but to the principles which govern that practice, and the reasons for the rule under discussion are fully stated in that judgment. . . . LORD HALSBURY.—It appears to me that this case comes distinctly within the principle pointed out by James, L.J., in International Financial Society v. City of Moscow Gas Co. He says that if it is a mere simple refusal of a simple application, the applicant knows very well what he has got to appeal against, and must give notice within the time allowed for an appeal against such refusal; but if the relief is granted, although not in a form satisfactory to the applicant, it is only reasonable he ought to know the precise terms of the order before he determines whether he will appeal.—p. 120.

Cox v. Barker (1876) 3 Ch. D. 359; 35 L. T. 635.—C.A. JAMES and MELLISH, L.JJ., and BAGGALLAY, J.A.

BAGGALLAY, J.A.—I felt a good deal pressed at first by the decisions of Wood, V.-C. in Rooke v. Kensington (Lord) and Bristow v. Whitmore; but it appears to me there is no room in this case for the objection which prevailed there. Sect. 50 of the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86 empowers the Court of Chancery to make binding declarations of right without giving consequential relief; and Wood, V.-C. was of opinion that it only empowered the Court to make such declarations of right in cases in which some equitable relief might be granted if the plaintiff chose to ask for it. But, in this case, it appears to me that, consequential upon the declaration of rights which is asked for, several forms of consequential relief might be granted.—p. 372.

WICKENS, V.-C.—According to the ordinary rule, this Court will not decide a legal question as to a right to real estate in remainder, and will not try the legal title to real estate not in remainder, at the instance of a person who is out of possession. Both propositions are elementary. As regards the former, De Windt v. De Windt was referred to during the argument, as giving the highest sanction to what was said in Greenwood v. Sutherland (supra) and Garlick v. Lawson (supra). But in fact, no authority is required for either. It is said, however, that the Court is asked to do no more here than was done in Key v. Key, by means of an artifice suggested by the Court in Forsbrook v. Forsbrook. If Key v. Key be law, the amendment in Forsbrook v. Forsbrook seems to have been unnecessary, so that the cases are not quite consistent. And notwithstanding my unfeigned respect for the judges who decided Key v. Key, and notwithstanding the fact stated to me, that the question of jurisdiction was there considered, I must decline to follow it, as regards the jurisdiction in any case not similar, which this is not.—p. 255.

Juttendromohun Tagore v. Ganendromohun Tagore (1872) L. R. Ind. App. Suppl. 47.—P.C. WILLES, J. (for the Court).—This case is distinguishable from Langdale (Lady) v. Briggs, where it was laid down that, generally speaking, it is not according to the course of the Courts in England to declare future rights, and it falls within the exceptions there contemplated in the judgment of Turner, L.J. (p. 428): because all the existing parties interested are in Court, and it is impossible to decide the case without considering the whole scope of the will, and arriving at judicial conclusions as to the rights of each of the parties thereunder, which judicial conclusions, so far as they dispose, or may dispose, of the rights of those parties, ought to be incorporated in the decree.—p. 84.

NORTH, J.—The persons served have not entered an appearance. I have to decide whether they ought to be served with notice of the setting down of this action for further consideration. In Rees, In re, Sir G. Jessel, M.R., made such an order. He considered that he had a discretion, and that as the order sought was to make parties personally liable for payment of money, it was right that such parties should be served with notice. But, in the absence of some special reason, such as the one in that case, I do not see why an order for service should be made.—p. 336.

FRY, J.—I do not say anything as to whether a consent given altogether without the intervention of the Court can be afterwards withdrawn. All that I said in Att.-Gen. v. Tomline was that, if in any case a judgment made by consent can be varied, it must be varied before it is drawn up. But after the Court has gone into the merits of the case and assented to a deliberate compromise, it would be extremely inconvenient to allow a person who had instructed counsel to enter into such a compromise to retract such consent.—p. 862.

COTTON, L.J.—If a consent has been duly given, it is not right that it should be arbitrarily withdrawn. Then are we bound by authority to hold that it may? The case of Rogers v. Horn certainly supports that view, but there are others which tend in the opposite direction, as Furnival v. Bogle (supra, col. 2427) and Holt v. Jesse (supra, col. 2427). In these cases, there was something in the nature of a compromise, and the decisions may be referable to there being an agreement for valuable consideration, but the remarks of Lord Lyndhurst in Furnival v. Bogle are strong, and do not put the matter in the ground of there being a binding agreement. In Seton on Decrees [p. 1536] Holt v. Jesse is referred to as deciding that where a party with knowledge of the facts authorises his counsel to consent, and the consent is given, he cannot afterwards withdraw it, but there again the case was one of compromise. . . . It must be understood henceforth to be the rule that a consent given by authority of the client cannot be withdrawn.—p. 255. COLERIDGE, C.J. concurred.

COTTON, L.J.—In Harvey v. Croydon Union Rural Sanitary Authority, PEARSON, J., considered himself bound to hold that, except in the case of a consent to a compromise sanctioned by the Judge, a party could withdraw his consent at any time before the order was passed, but the C.A. decided that it could not be withdrawn arbitrarily, but only on the ground of mistake or surprise, or for some other sufficient reason.—p. 54. LORD HOBHOUSE (for self, LORDS MORRIS and DAVEY, and SIR R. COUCH).—For the appeal reliance was placed on the judgments of Lord Esher and Bowen, L.J., in Gowan v. Wright. They were construing the enactment that a Judge's order for judgment made by consent of the defendant in a personal action, should be filed in the way prescribed, and otherwise should be void. This they held to mean void as against creditors, not as against the parties to the order. And they refer to analogous cases in which the Courts have held that the object of the enactment under their consideration was to protect creditors or other persons not parties to the transaction under consideration, and have therefore restricted to that object the nullity of the transaction which the enactment declares in unqualified terms.—p. 80.

PEARSON, J.—The first case to which I will refer is that of King v. Sandeman. The head-note, which is substantially right, is this: "The plaintiff being unready to proceed with the trial of his action when it came on unexpectedly, applied for a postponement, and upon its being refused, let judgment go by default. The C. A., upon fresh materials, offering a reasonable explanation of the plaintiff's unreadiness, set aside the judgment, and ordered the action to be restored to the list on the plaintiff paying the costs of the day, including all costs thrown away." The late M.R., Sir G. Jessel, says this: "I do not decide this case with as much satisfaction as most cases. On the one hand, if we draw the string very tight, no plaintiff would be able to proceed to trial if not ready exactly at the day of trial. Solicitors would be required to do what they cannot always be sure of being able to do. On the other hand, we must be careful not to allow people to use the C. A. to remedy the effects of carelessness. This case is very near the line. On the whole, I think the case should be tried on its merits." And then he says that the plaintiff could not, with reasonable diligence, have got all the material information till the 4th of March, from the 4th to the 7th the action was not in the paper, and a long way down the list. On the 8th it came on suddenly. Under these circumstances, the plaintiff being in default as little as he could be, the Court ordered the judgment to be set aside. Thesiger, L.J., who also went into the case (Cotton, L.J. merely concurring), says this: "Certainly material documents could not be obtained till the 4th of March. If a summons had then been taken out for time, it would have been a proper case for indulgence, and if so, the slip of the plaintiff's solicitor in thinking the case would not come on is not enough to take away the indulgence. The case is very near the line, but being doubtful, the doubt should be decided in favour of trying the action on the merits, instead of putting the plaintiff to the expense of bringing another action."

Another case cited was that of Atwood v. Chichester. That was a case in which a lady had signed, at the request of her husband, a promissory note. A writ was issued against her, she put it into her husband's hands to defend the action. Her husband did nothing, and judgment was signed against the defendant. Now, in that case, the action being against a married woman, was bad altogether, and Brett, L.J. said he thought the plaintiff knew she was a married woman, and he knew that no action could be brought, yet, in spite of that, Brett, L.J. says, "From the facts before us, I draw the inference that when she handed the writ to her husband, she did not understand its meaning, and that she did not know the consequences of suffering judgment by default. After various other proceedings, a summons is taken out to commit the defendant. Now, if it could have been shown that the object of the writ was at the time of service explained to her, she could not at this stage of the proceedings have been permitted to defend after suffering judgment by default; but she does not appear to have been informed by her husband what her position really was. I agree with the view of Bramwell, L.J.; the plaintiff could not have successfully prosecuted this action." Cotton, L.J. says this: "None of the provisions of the Judicature Acts have rendered a married woman liable to be sued as if she were unmarried. I should have thought that if the defendant had lain by intentionally, she could not be now allowed to appear; but the neglect to defend must be attributed to her husband, and she cannot be considered to have been guilty of such laches as to disentitle her to relief." "It seems to me that there is no case which has gone to show that this rule can be acted upon where the party who seeks to put it in force has, with full knowledge and wilfully, allowed judgment to go by default.—p. 433.

ROMER, J.—V. Williams, J. [Huddersfield Banking Co. v. Lister & Son] refused to upset an order for a compromise on motion, on the ground that he had no jurisdiction to do so.

When that case was before the C. A. leave was given to bring an action, and the C. A. did not entertain the application in its then form. . . .

The C. A. directed apparently by consent, that an action should be brought. As to Emeris v. Woodward, it is not clear on the report what the exact facts were, and I cannot find whether the order had been passed and entered or not. If it had, it is clearly an authority in point and against the applicant. If it had not, then it goes beyond what the respondents ask me to decide here, for North, J. held that he could not entertain an application by summons. But that was before Hickman v. Berens (supra, col. 2431), and I cannot say consistently with Hickman v. Berens that it would now be held that an action to set aside a compromise was necessary in every case, even although the order had not been drawn up.—p. 434.

A. L. SMITH, M.R.—The applicant there [Preston Banking Co. v. Allsup & Sons (post, col. 2435)] desired to re-open an order of the Court and incidentally to obtain a new order as to costs. The V.-C. of the County Palatine of Lancaster held that he had no jurisdiction to grant the relief applied for, and his refusal was affirmed. That has no bearing on a case where there has been an accidental slip. . . . There [Fritz v. Hobson] the plaintiff in taking final judgment in the action had omitted to ask for the costs of an interlocutory motion, which had been adjourned to the hearing and had in fact been forgotten. The omission was afterwards discovered, and an application was made that the judgment as drawn up might be varied so as to include the costs of the motion and so rectify the blunder. Fry, J. there held that under one or other jurisdiction, either that under Ord. XXVIII. r. 11, or that which is inherent in the Court itself, there was power to amend the blunder. Then there is Barker v. Purris, where the C. A. expressed the same view of Ord. XXVIII. r. 11, and held that blunders of this kind could be rectified under its terms.—p. 395. COLLINS and ROMER, L.JJ. concurred.

LORD HOBHOUSE, (for the Court).—Their lordships do not doubt that the Court has power at any time to correct an error in a decree or order arising from a slip or accidental omission. A recent instance of the exercise of this power occurred in Hutton v. Harris, before the H. L., where an error arising from an accidental omission was corrected after the lapse of forty years. The H. L. in that case approved the views expressed by the C. A. in Mellor v. Swire.—p. 126.

ROMER, J.—Swire, In re. . . decided that, even where a judgment had been duly passed and entered, it might still be altered by the Court if the Court saw that it did not truly represent the decision which the Court had pronounced. . . That case, therefore, has no true bearing upon the one before me, which is not one where it can be said that the judgment does not properly express the meaning and intention of the Court. Mullins v. Howell (supra, col. 2432), to which I have already referred, was a case of an order made on an interlocutory application, and that was the very ground taken by Sir G. Jessel for entertaining the jurisdiction to discharge the order, though he states a further ground, namely that the Court had discretion as to issuing an attachment, and would not in that case exercise it. That case, therefore, is no authority here. Barker v. Purris (supra, col. 2434) was a case of a slip which was corrected under Ord. XXVIII. r. 11.—pp. 443, 444.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—It is true that Staniar v. Evans. . . seems to show that there is jurisdiction; but it does not appear that in that case the judge's attention was called to St. Nazaire Co., In re, which . . . shows that when an order or judgment of the High Court has once been perfected there is no jurisdiction in the Court to alter it; nor was his attention called—indeed it could not have been, as the decision I am going to refer to was a subsequent decision—to Suffield and Watts, In re, Brown, Ex parte (supra), where Fry, L. J., refers to and adopts St. Nazaire Co., In re. I think that Staniar v. Evans would have to be reconsidered, should the occasion come for doing so. I think that Fry, L. J., was right in Suffield and Watts, In re, when he said that Cave, J., had no power to rehear the matter.—p. 54.

TURNER, L.J.—I think the cases warrant this conclusion, that a mere error in judgment does not furnish a sufficient foundation for such a bill [of review]. Lord Eldon has expressly so stated in Perry v. Phelps, and Lord Cottenham has adopted that statement in Trulock v. Robey. Lord Cottenham has, indeed gone further, and speaks of such bills as confined to cases in which the decree is contrary to the forms of practice of the Court, but with all deference to so high an authority, I venture to doubt whether this latter position is correct.—p. 509.

ERLE, C.J.—It is said that the authorities show that no action will lie on a judge's order. I have looked at Hookpayton v. Bussell, and in terms it supports Mr. Crompton's argument; but the order in that case provided that "if the defendant made default in payment, the plaintiff should be at liberty to issue execution by pieri facias, or cupias ad satisfaciendum." The agreement evidenced by the order, therefore, was an agreement that if the defendant failed to perform his part, the plaintiff should avail himself of that particular remedy. In Thames Ironworks Co. v. Patent Derrick Co., the order similarly empowered the plaintiffs, in case the defendants made default, to issue execution for a particular sum; it therefore provided a particular form of remedy, and the ordinary remedy by action was consequently taken away. It is the same as the ordinary case in which the right of action is taken away by an agreement to refer all disputes to arbitration. The decisions, therefore, were in both cases correct, but the expressions used by the judges were wider than necessary.—p. 573. BYLES and M. SMITH, JJ. concurred.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—This is not a case like *Dent v. The principle of that case was followed in *Hookpayton v. A. L. SMITH, L.J.—Prior to the Judicature Act, 1873, and Ord. XLII. r. 24, no person could bring an action upon a judge's order, and confining my remarks to the High Court the reason is obvious. It would be an unnecessary waste of legal proceedings to allow such an action to go on, for a person could take proceedings by way of execution under the rules of Court. If authority be wanted, I refer to Bullen & Leake's Precedents of Pleadings (3rd ed.), p. 194, where it is stated "an action will not lie upon a rule of Court or a judge's order," and cases are there cited in support of that statement. Then the question arose whether that rule had not been altered by Ord. XLII. r. 24. It was held in Godfrey v. George and Pritchett v. English and Colonial Syndicate, both of which are decisions to a similar effect, that an action can by virtue of Ord. XLII. r. 24 be brought upon a judge's order; and whether that is right or not is not for us to decide, because those decisions are binding on this Court.—p. 898.

V. WILLIAMS, L.J.—The reasoning upon which the cases were decided will be found in the note to Emerson v. Lashley, and it will be found to apply just as much to an order in a County Court for the payment of costs as to a like order in one of the old superior Courts of Q.B., C.P., or Ex. But I go further, for the marginal note in Emerson v. Lashley is this: "No action will lie in this Court to recover costs ordered to be paid by a rule of an inferior Court in the course of a suit there, notwithstanding the defendant should not be liable to an attachment of the inferior Court, by being resident out of the jurisdiction." So that that is a positive decision—although it was before the passing of the County Courts Acts, 1846 (9 & 10 Vict. c. 95)—that although an action might have been brought upon a judgment of a superior Court, yet it could not have been brought upon an order.—p. 899.

JESSEL, M.R.—Considering the number of years

which have elapsed since Clarke v. Law was decided, and considering the good sense of the decision, I should have thought its authority unquestionable, had it not been for the observations attributed to Lord Selborne in Pike v. Dickinson, which probably are incorrectly reported, and which I do not understand. The principle of Clarke v. Law is quite intelligible—a party who has given notice to read an affidavit is not entitled to withdraw it in order to avoid cross-examination. He need not use the evidence if he does not like it. So a party who has called a witness is not to withdraw him in order to avoid his being cross-examined. This is good sense, and, in my opinion, we are not now at liberty to decline to follow that decision.—p. 641. BRETT and COTTON, L.JJ. to the same effect.

Lewis* . . . shows the practice which Knight Bruce, L.J., when V.-C., adopted in his Court, namely, that when an applicant obtained short notice of motion he should state on the notice which is served on the other party that leave was obtained to serve the notice on a certain day for a certain day, so that the person served should understand not only that he was to appear on the day appointed, but that leave had been given to serve the notice short of the two clear days to which he would otherwise have been entitled. That was a reasonable practice; . . . we think, therefore, that whether the practice has been usually followed or not in the other Courts up to this time, it ought to be understood that it is to be the practice for the future, so that there may be no mistake about it.—p. 508.

COTTON, L.J.—Here the notice did not state that leave was given for short notice; therefore the defendant was entitled to disregard it, and I find that is laid down by Knight Bruce, V.-C., in Harris v. Lewis, and the same point was decided by Kindersley, V.-C. in Chambers v. Toynebee. I have always myself understood that to be the practice.—p. 510.

Fritz v. Hobson (1880) 14 Ch. D. 542; 49 L. J. Ch. 735; 42 L. T. 677; 28 W. R. 722.

FRY, J.—According to my understanding of the practice . . . all orders of the Court carry with them in gremio liberty to apply to the Court. In Viney v. Chaplin application was made under the liberty to apply reserved by the order that the motion should stand to the hearing of the cause, and it appears to me, therefore, that I am right in following Viney v. Chaplin, and that I can make the order which I am now about to make either under the liberty to apply reserved by implication in the order on the motion, or under the liberty expressly reserved by the judgment . . . I shall make a separate order (following the precedent in Tiney v. Chaplin) directing the taxation of the plaintiff's costs of the motion, and their payment by the defendant.—pp. 561, 562.

COTTON, L.J.—Credits Gerundense v. Van Weede was a case of interpleader, and the decision may perhaps be supported on the ground that the object of service was not to give jurisdiction over the party served, but only to give him notice of a proceeding affecting his rights, that he might if he pleased come in and defend them, and it is on this that Pollock, B. rests his judgment. In . . . Weldon v. Gounod, an application to serve out of the jurisdiction a summons for the appointment of a receiver was refused.—p. 132.

CHITTY, J.—In Cookney v. Anderson, an application was made for leave to serve a copy of the bill upon the defendants in Scotland, and was refused by Lord Westbury, on the ground that the words "any suit" in r. 7 of Ord. X. of the Consolidated Orders of 1860 must be taken to denote such suits only as are described in 2 Wm. 4, c. 33, and 4 & 5 Wm. 4, c. 82, and that the rule read in a more extensive sense was ultra vires. This decision was subsequently overruled by Lord Chelmsford and Turner, L.J. in Drummond v. Drummond (post, col. 2452), and the validity of the general order was established. In the interval between these two decisions Alcan's Estate, In re (post), was decided by the L.J.J., and leave was there given to serve an administration summons relating to stocks and shares in England on a defendant abroad. This decision, therefore, did not conflict with Lord Westbury's decision in Cookney v. Anderson, for the case fell within the statutes of Wm. 4. These statutes relate to service out of the jurisdiction in certain specified suits only, namely, those concerning land, or any charge, lien, judgment, or incumbrance thereon, or concerning stocks or shares within the jurisdiction.—p. 126.

BYRNE, J.—In Drummond v. Drummond, where it was held that the Court had power under the old consolidated orders to order service of copy bill on the defendant, who was an Englishman resident in Germany, although the nature of the suit was not such as to bring it within the provisions of the Acts 2 Wm. 4, c. 33, and 4 & 5 Wm. 4, c. 82, Turner, L.J., says: "The question in this case, as I view it, is not against whom, or under what circumstances, or with relation to what property, the Legislature of a country may be justified in authorising the process of its Courts to be served out of the jurisdiction of those Courts, but whether the Legislature of this country has not in fact authorised the process of this Court to be so served." The nature of the action in that case was, as appears from the report of the case in the Court below, one having no relation to any property in England, but to enforce a claim depending upon Scotch law and to obtain a release of the Scotch lauds from a charge.—p. 623.

BOWEN, L.J.—In an early case before Lord Eldon, Stevenson v. Anderson (col. 2449), it was held that service of notice of an interpleader might be made on a foreigner abroad; and although I am aware that his view has been somewhat questioned, there have been two concurrent lines of authority—authorities in which notices have been allowed to be served abroad, and cases in which notices have not been allowed to be served abroad, or in which the service of the notice abroad has been held to be of no avail in this country. These cases were all reviewed in Busfield, In re, and Cotton, L.J. points out during the argument the distinction between a case where the object of the service abroad is merely to give notice of the proceedings with regard to which the Court has jurisdiction in this country, and a case where the object of the service abroad is to create jurisdiction at home. He distinguishes the authorities according as they fall on one side or other of the line. Although that was assumed, Cotton, L.J. does not, I think, intimate an absolute approval of the view that notice of an interpleader will avail if it is effectuated abroad, and that has been always a point on which the decisions have been, perhaps, not quite consistent.—p. 484.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—Rules 1 to 5 of Ord. XXXV. are all imperative. They each provide that the several matters with which they deal "shall" be done in the district registry. In my opinion these rules give the district registrar exclusive jurisdiction in all those matters. Then we come to r. 6. There the word used is "may," and, in my judgment, the true reading of the rules is that r. 6 gives concurrent jurisdiction to the district registrar and the master over matters as to which exclusive jurisdiction has not already been given to the district registrar by the preceding rules 1 to 5. In Hood v. Yates the Divisional Court went further than was necessary for the decision there, and I think that we may, without overruling the actual decision in that case, say that the view I have expressed gives the true construction of the rules. What was done by the Rule Committee in 1894 is quite intelligible having regard to what had been said by the Court in Hood v. Yates.—p. 6. RIGBY and COLLINS, L.J.J. concurred.

FRY, J.—Hall, V.-C., in Smith, In re, held that a district registrar has no power to take accounts which are directed by a judgment to be taken, unless the judgment expressly directs him to do so. In the present case, the registrar's original order did not direct that the account should be taken by himself. This practice has been established for five years, and I think I should be wrong in departing from it.—p. 543.

Whittaker*, stated that he should not, except under very special circumstances, direct the costs of actions of this kind [i.e., administration actions], though commenced and prosecuted in the district registry, to be taxed otherwise than by a taxing master in the Ch. Div. If I may respectfully say so, I think that is the right principle to act upon in these cases.—p. 245.

LINDLEY, L.J.—North, J., in Chifferiel, In re, held that the judge in chambers had authority to fix a time within which affidavits must be filed in any application. In this I think he was right; but there is no rule directly applicable to a case of this description. It has, however, been found convenient to deal with it in chambers by saying to a party, "If you wish to cross-examine, you may do so, but under ordinary circumstances you must bring in your own evidence first, and cross-examine afterwards." This has been found in practice to work well, and is understood in the judges' chambers; and it is well known to practitioners there that an order to cross-examine cannot be got except upon that understanding.

... We are asked to condemn this practice. I should condemn it if the rule were laid down as a hard-and-fast rule, but that is not so; it is only laid down as a convenient general rule.—p. 260.

But I think it is not, because it appears that there was a judge sitting at chambers within four days from the order, for the order was made on the 23rd December, and the judge sat on the 27th. In this case there was no such possibility of going before a judge within four days.—p. 265.

BUCKLEY, J.—A number of cases have been cited, but the material ones to my mind are these: Haynes v. Haynes, where it was presumed that a spinster aged fifty-three and two months was past the age of child-bearing; but the head-note to the report adds the query, "whether this age is not too low"; Widow's Trust, In re, where Malins, V.C., made the presumption in the case of a widow aged fifty-five and four months who had never had any children, and in the case of a spinster aged fifty-three years and nine months; Millner's Estate, In re, where the age of the lady was forty-nine years and nine months, and the husband was still living, and she had never had a child. The marriage had taken place in 1846, and the decision was pronounced in 1872, so that there had been twenty-six years of married life, no issue, and the husband was still living; Davidson v. Kimpton ((1881) 18 Ch. D. 213—see "WILL"), where the lady was a spinster of the age of fifty-four; Lyddon v. Ellison, where the lady was a spinster and fifty-six years of age. It will be observed that in all the cases to which I have referred the ages were less than that of the lady in the present case [fifty-six years and three months]; but it will also be observed that I have not mentioned any case of a widow who had had a child. One case was that of a widow, but she had never had any children—Widow's Trust, In re; and there was one case in which the marriage was still subsisting—Millner's Estate, In re. In these circumstances I have to consider whether the cases relating to spinsters do not equally apply to widows who have had children. The only difference that occurs to me is that there is nothing to show in the case of spinsters whether they are or have been capable of child-bearing, while in the case of a widow who has had a child there is. On the other hand, if there has been a long lapse of time since the birth of a child, as in this case—twenty-three years—the presumption would be that the capacity of child-bearing had ceased. It seems to me that I can apply the principle of the cases relating to spinsters to widows who have had children.—p. 301.

STIRLING, J.—It is equally well settled that where the fund is in Court an encumbrancer cannot effectually gain priority except by obtaining a stop order. So far as I can discover, the first reported case in which this was decided was Greening v. Beckford (supra), but no reasons are given for the decision. The foundation of the rule was carefully considered by Lord Hatherley (then Wood, V.-C.) in Warburton v. Hill. In that case a judgment creditor of a person interested in a fund in Court had obtained charging orders on the debtor's interest, and had left copies at the office of the Accountant-General, and entries had been made of the orders, but he obtained no stop order. The V.-C., although he did not decide the case on this ground, expressed the opinion that the judgment creditor's notice did not give priority.—p. 343.

COTTON, L.J. (after referring to Holmes, In re, continued:—) There was also a case of Elder v. Maclean, in which there is a short passage at the end of the judgment as it is reported, which apparently did give support to the contention; but although that passage is in the Weekly Reporter, it is not to be found in the report in the Jurist, to which we have been referred. Whether there is any inaccuracy in the report, or it was not argued, one can hardly tell; but if it was so laid down by Kindersley, V.-C., with the greatest respect for his care, intelligence, and knowledge of the law, I think it was erroneous, as laying down a wrong principle.—p. 468.

BOWEN, L.J.—Holmes, In re, decides nothing more than this, that you cannot, by getting a stop order, obtain a right which was unjust and contrary to the principles of equity to obtain. The passage . . . in Elder v. Maclean is not to be found either in the Jurist or in any of the regular constituted reports, and I do not think it can be relied upon absolutely.—p. 472.

A Solicitor, In re, Dudley, Ex parte (1885) 33 W. R. 750.

DENMAN, J.—Clause 52 in the schedule to the order as to Supreme Court Fees, 1884, raises the question whether the fee of 2*l.* therein mentioned must be paid before this appeal can be set down for hearing. Hasker, Ex parte, decided that the fee was payable in a proceeding in the nature of a mandamus to compel a magistrate to hear an application for a summons. That case does not seem to me to affect the present one. All that that case decided was that the rule was as applicable to Crown as to civil matters; but there the application to the Court was an application in an original matter.—p. 751.

ESHER, M.R.—In . . . May v. Wooding a verdict had been obtained more than three years before judgment was signed, and a term's notice was not given; but it was held by the Court of K. B. that the judgment was duly signed. Newton v. Boodle appears to have been decided upon the authority of May v. Wooding. These were cases of proceeding after verdict, and it is not necessary to consider whether we could agree with these decisions; if the present were a case as to a proceeding after verdict, it would perhaps be difficult for us to express dissent from those cases; but it is to be observed that they were decided upon different Rules of Court, and it may be that they are not binding as to the construction of Ord. LXIV. r. 13; at all events they apply only where there has been a verdict. In the present case a month's notice of the intention to proceed ought to have been given.—p. 233.

Lumb v. Beaumont (1884) 49 L. T. 772.
PEARSON, J.—Lord Selborne's judgment means this: If you may not plead anything except what you must prove in order to succeed, seduction must not be pleaded by the plaintiff in an action for breach of promise of marriage; but if you may plead material facts, as tending to support your case, then seduction may be so pleaded. That is all he says. You cannot say here, as was said there, that the facts pleaded will have any bearing on the amount of damages (p. 773). I agree that in these days you may put into pleadings not only matters which are material for proving the course of action alleged, but also any facts which can be properly given in evidence at the trial. That is what is laid down in Millington v. Loring.—p. 774.

BAGGALLAY, L.J.—Martin v. Powning was not decided upon demurrer, though no doubt it amounts to a decision that the question there raised by plea could have been raised by demurrer. But the distinction between that case and the present is this, that sect. 197 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, was absolute in its terms, and made no exception in the case of fraud, whereas sect. 127 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, makes the registration of the resolutions conclusive only in the absence of fraud.—p. 439.

KAY, J.—Philippis v. Philippis was an action for the recovery of land of which the plaintiff had never been in possession, and the statement was put in two or three ways, so as to give what Lord Bramwell speaks of as alternative rights to relief; but no deed or documents under or by virtue of which the plaintiff derived or deduced his title were stated, and the plaintiff confined himself to general averments. . . . It was held by the whole Court unanimously that the pleading was an embarrassing pleading, because it did not state that which the defendant was entitled to have stated for his own protection, and that, therefore, the pleading must be struck out; and this although it was not possible to demur to it successfully. Now, certainly there is nothing in the new rules which in the least degree interferes with the decision in Philippis v. Philippis. It is true that now there can be no demurrer, and the advantage which was formerly taken by way of demurrer must now be taken in a different way; but this pleading, if the case comes within Philippis v. Philippis is entirely within that decision; because there is nothing in the new rules which at all interferes—there is no alteration in Ord. XIX. r. 4, which makes the least difference so far as the decision in Philippis v. Philippis is concerned.—pp. 781, 782.

Philippis v. Philippis and Davis v. James, distinguished.

Darbyshire v. Leigh (1896) 65 L. J. Q. B. 360; [1896] 1 Q. B. 554; 74 L. T. 241; 44 W. R. 452.—C.A.

ESHER, M.R.—The facts of that case [Philippis v. Philippis] were entirely different from the facts here. There several documents were referred to, but the effect of any one of them was not stated. The pleader had not complied with the first part of the rule [Ord. XIX. r. 21]. The decision did not turn on the latter part of the rule, which had no application to the case.—p. 362.

LOPES, L.J.—In that case [Philippis v. Philippis] the legal effect of any document had not been set out. All that was done was to refer to a number of documents and state the result of them altogether. The decision of Kay, L.J., in Davis v. James does not seem to be inconsistent with our decision in this case.—Id.

RIGBY, L.J.—In Davis v. James, which was relied upon, the plaintiff, after alleging the fact of a lease having been made, professed to sue upon the covenants in it as owner of the reversion, without stating how he became entitled to the reversion. Kay, J. held that the pleading was insufficient, and referred to a passage in Stephen on Pleading (7th ed., p. 254), namely, "where a party claims by conveyance or alienation, the nature of the conveyance or alienation must in general be stated, as whether it be by devise, feoffment, &c." That was the ground upon which the learned judge acted. It is quite clear that it is not sufficient for a plaintiff to state in general language that he is entitled to possession; he must state how he is so entitled. The learned judge said he had no idea what the reversion was which the plaintiff claimed. That decision seems to me to be precisely in accordance with the grounds of the decision in Philippis v. Philippis.—p. 363.

FRY, J.—In Catling v. King, according to my reading of the decision of the C. A., and not merely of what was said in the course of argument, the Court held that the defence of the Statute of Frauds cannot now be raised by demurrer. That case came before the decision of the H. L., who expressed the same opinion in Dawkins v. Perrehyne (Lord) (post, col. 2475). Cairns, L.C., said: "The analogy which was referred to of the Statute of Frauds is not an analogy of any weight. The Statute of Frauds must be pleaded, because it never can be predicted beforehand that a defendant who may shelter himself under the Statute of Frauds desires to do so." There appears to have been a subsequent case before the M.R., the exact nature of which is not before me, which confirms my view of the case. I have referred to Clarke v. Gifford (supra, col. 2473) before the Q. B. D. The question requiring adjudication in that case was, whether, where the statement of claim had alleged that there was an acceptance and receipt of the commodity sold, so as to take the contract alleged out of the Statute of Frauds, it was necessary for the defendant to plead the Statute if he wished to take advantage of it; and Brett, L.J., said this: "Ord. XIX. r. 3 is, in my opinion, intended partly as an enunciation of the jealousy with which the law regards that class of defences, and partly to assimilate the practice at law and in equity. If r. 23 is to be obeyed, if the defendant intends to insist on the defence that, though he undoubtedly entered into a contract yet, as that contract was not in writing, he does not intend to observe it, then he must clearly state his intention, or if he means to deny the legality of a contract he has entered into, he must say so in plain terms." Without saying that that case determines the present, it certainly leans towards the view I have expressed.—p. 737.

MALINS, V.-C.—Miller v. Miller . . . was cited as a general authority, that between persons who have been partners, where there has once been a partnership, and the executor of one partner brings a bill for an account against the other after any lapse of time whatever, the statute cannot be taken advantage of. I cannot think that Sir J. Stuart, with his great learning and experience, could ever have intended to decide in such a manner. On the contrary, I believe the decision must have proceeded on the ground that in that case the parties had executed a deed by which all the partnership property was assigned on trust to pay the creditors, and afterwards to divide what remained between them. There, a trust being created, nothing short of twenty years could be a bar to that trust. I think it must have proceeded on that ground, not on the general principle that, as between partners, no lapse of time will be a bar to an action. If Sir J. Stuart did decide that, I can only say I entirely dissent from the decision, as every other case has dissented from it; and it is certainly overruled by the decision of the H. L. in Knox v. Gye (supra), which decided the broad point that, Wakelee a bill for an account is filed by the executor of a deceased partner against the surviving partner after the lapse of more than six years; Wakelee the business, which in that case was a partnership of a theatre, was carried on by the surviving partner during the six years, the Statute of Limitations is a final bar to such a claim; and that is greatly to the benefit of society, because it is of the utmost importance that time should put an end to all disputes. . . . I am bound to say that Wakelee v. Davis is an authority which I cannot understand after the decision of the C. A. [Dawkins v. Penrhyn (Lord), (post)], which is so utterly inconsistent with it, and which is a subsequent decision. I think Wakelee v. Davis must be considered to be overruled by that authority.—p. 37.

POLLOCK, C.B.—The language of Lord Ellenborough, in Boyce v. Douglas, is a mere casual remark, not called for, and, therefore, not amounting to a decision. . . . ROLFE, B.—King v. Hoare has no bearing upon the question. The decision there was, that a judgment recovered against one of two joint debtors is a bar to an action against the other; and it proceeded on the ground that the plaintiff was going on to judgment in a matter that had passed in rem judicatum.—p. 300.

LORD BLACKBURN.—There is a difficulty in the case which I am about to mention, and I do not know whether or not it has been thoroughly considered. It may very well be that when you are serving the partners, who are all ostensible partners, and you know who are the partners, there may be no difficulty, when you have served one partner and an appearance is entered, in going on against the firm and getting your judgment ultimately. But King v. Hoare (and a comparatively recent case in the H. L. [Kendall v. Hamilton]) went to the same point) shows that where there is a dormant and concealed partner, your getting judgment for a joint debt against the other partners will bar you from commencing an action against that concealed principal, because the mere fact of the judgment without execution turns it into rem judicatum, and it is a bar. There may be difficulties arising in such cases as that.—p. 688.

V. WILLIAMS, L.J.—Here one of the defendants has improved his position by making a payment into Court. Why should the other, who made no such payment, be put in the same improved position? King v. Wild are cited as authorities entitling him to be put in that position, because they decide that satisfaction by one of two persons jointly liable is a satisfaction of the whole liability. But those cases have no application here, for there never was any satisfaction of this cause of action against the council by the mere payment into Court by the contractor.—p. 707.

BRETT, L.J.—It has been contended that the same issue ought not to be tried in an English Court which was tried in the Russian Courts, but I agree that the question whether the Russian Courts were deceived never could be an issue in the action tried before them. That question might be raised in the Russian Courts in order to determine the matters which were in issue; but I think it is true to say that the judgment of Knight Bruce, V.-C., in Barrs v. Jackson does show that the mere fact of evidence having been brought forward to substantiate or defeat one issue, does not prevent a party from bringing forward the same evidence in a subsequent action between the same parties, either to maintain or to defend other issues raised therein.—p. 306.

KENNEDY, J.—There are good reasons why at common law the recovery of a judgment should afford a perfectly good defence or plea in bar, for the Court has already given by the judgment the relief sought by the plaintiff, and entirely fresh proceedings on his part could only result in his obtaining another judgment; this was pointed out by Tindal, C.J. in Smith v. Nicolls, and is consistent with common sense. But the same rule has never been applied to bankruptcy proceedings; a judgment is prima facie conclusive evidence of the existence of the debt upon which it is founded, and its existence is no bar to the creditor's obtaining his rights on the debt which existed before the judgment.—p. 193.

FRY, J.—The point which now arises for my determination is one upon which the present M.R. has, in Original Hartlepool Collieries Co. v. Gibb, expressed a decided opinion. He has held that the damages claimed by a counterclaim must be limited to the date when the writ in the original action was issued. The result of that, of course, is this, that a counterclaim can never extend to any right of action subsequent to the date of the original writ. The point is one of very great importance as regulating the procedure under the Judicature Acts, and as I have the misfortune to differ in opinion from the M.R., I desire to encourage an application to the C. A., in order that the question may be finally determined.—p. 180. . . . The M.R. has, no doubt, in Vavasour v. Krupp, held that a counterclaim fails or falls to the ground with the original action. But, if the view of the late L.C.J. of England and of Brett, L.J., and also, I may add, of Manisty, J., in Stooke v. Taylor ((1880) 49 L. J. Q. B. 857; 5 Q. B. D. 569, post, col. 2486), be the correct one—viz., that the counterclaim constitutes a wholly independent action, it would seem, to say the least, doubtful whether the decision in Vavasour v. Krupp is correct.—p. 183.

JESSEL, M.R.—With regard to Shephard v. Beane I do not think the V.-C. intended to lay down that a "counterclaim" is the right form of such a pleading as between co-defendants. He does not, in fact, use the word in his decision, and it seems to me, therefore, that the head-note of the case is incorrect in so laying it down.—p. 587.

Harris v. Gamble (1877) 6 Ch. D. 748; 46 L. J. Ch. 768.

HALL, V.-C.—Shephard v. Beane was an irregular application for the direction of the Court, which, perhaps, ought not to have been entertained (p. 751). I may add, that I consider that Shephard v. Beane ought not to be cited as an authority.—p. 752.

COTTON, L.J.—In Furness v. Booth the question was whether or no there was any counterclaim, and it was decided that there was no counterclaim; here the question is whether there is a good counterclaim. I think clearly that there is.—p. 152.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—He [the defendant] is not by his counterclaim raising any question between himself and the plaintiffs along with any other person within the meaning of Ord. XXI. r. 11. The question he raises is a question between himself along with another person and the plaintiffs, and he makes Bellani a defendant to the counterclaim when he ought to be a co-plaintiff. In my opinion the defendant cannot do indirectly what the rule does not, as it appears to me, enable him to do directly. In so holding there is nothing inconsistent between our decision and what was said by Bramwell, L.J., in Turner v. Hednesford Gas Co.—p. 704. CHITTY and COLLINS, L.JJ. concurred.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—In my opinion Field, J. and Huddleston, B. did not decide what it is now said that they did. In the first place, they had not to decide upon the construction of Ord. XXI. r. 8. What they decided was that, where a plaintiff sued a defendant and the defendant counterclaimed against the plaintiff, the plaintiff could counterclaim against the counterclaim of the defendant for a cause of action which accrued to the plaintiff after the issue of the writ. That was all those learned judges decided. . . . It is no decision that a person brought in by a defendant can counterclaim against an original plaintiff. It is true that Field, J. points out that Lush, J. [in Street v. Gover] had doubts as to whether he was placing the correct construction upon the word "reply" in Ord. XXII. r. 8, but he and Mellor, J. did nevertheless expressly hold that the word "reply" did not include a counterclaim, and so it has remained until the present time. . . . In Eden v. Wear-dale Iron and Coal Co. [(1884) 54 L. J. Ch. 384; 28 Ch. D. 333; see supra, col. 2343], in which a third party was brought in by a defendant under Ord. XVI. r. 48, in order that the defendant might obtain indemnity or contribution from him, it was argued that such third party could file a counterclaim against the original plaintiff; but this Court held that he could not, and Bowen, L.J. and Fry, L.J. pointed out the inconveniences which would arise if this were allowed, and similar inconveniences would, as it appears to me, arise in the present case if the application were allowed.—p. 100.

COLLINS, L.J.—The technical point is taken that this is a counterclaim set up by the plaintiffs in reply, and that the R. S. C. do not contemplate such a proceeding; and we are referred to James v. Page as deciding that such a course is not open to a plaintiff. Upon that case there is the incidental observation to be made that the claim there set up was intended not as a shield but as a sword. . . . In that case [Toke v. Andrews] the plaintiff had brought an action for arrears of rent. After the writ, but before the statement of claim was delivered, the tenancy determined, and the defendant became entitled to an outgoing valuation, for which, in so far as it exceeded the plaintiff's claim, he counterclaimed. In answer to this the plaintiff, in his reply, claimed the quarter's rent due on the determination of the tenancy and a certain sum for tithe-rent charge left unpaid by the defendant. There was no machinery in that case, any more than in the present, to allow such a claim to be set up in the reply. Yet the Court held that it would be unjust to strike out the claims set up in reply. . . . I think that Toke v. Andrews was a just decision.—p. 516.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree that, as a rule, if a plaintiff wants to set up an additional claim he should do so by amendment of the statement of claim in regular course—James v. Page—but that rule has exceptions. . . . The Court has jurisdiction by way of exception to allow a plaintiff to set up a cause of action as counterclaim to the defendant's counterclaim. In my opinion, Toke v. Andrews is right in principle, and ought to be followed. That case worked a great deal of good.—p. 517.

LORD HOBHOUSE (for the Court).—Unliquidated damages may now be set off as between the original parties, and also against an assignee if flowing out of and inseparably connected with the dealings and transactions which also give rise to the subject of the assignment. It appears to their lordships that in the cited case of Young v. Kitchen the decision to allow the counterclaim was rested entirely on this principle.—p. 213.

JESSEL, M.R.—I did not decide in Holloway v. York that a counterclaim should do any more than state the facts properly on which the counterclaim was founded. I did not decide that they were to be stated all over again. . . . He need not print them all over again; it is quite enough if he refer to them, and thereupon counterclaims.—p. 509.

FRY, J.—In Crowe v. Barnicot the defendant only claimed damages "for the loss he has sustained in consequence of his expenditure aforesaid." Here the reference is to "the said two orders and writs of ne erant regno," which have been previously mentioned. I think this is unobjectionable. It is not necessary that a counterclaim should have the words "by way of counterclaim" printed in big letters at the head of it. I think this case does not come within my ruling in Crowe v. Barnicot.—p. 868.

RIGBY, L.J.—In Howard v. Hill the objection was taken that the statement of claim did not disclose any reasonable cause of action. It happened that certain rules of a society were referred to in the statement of claim, and counsel for the defendants in support of the objection proposed to read other rules of the society. They were not allowed to do so, upon the ground that the only question was as to the sufficiency of the claim as it stood. In Williamson v. L. & N. W. Ry. all that Hall, V.-C. decided was that to refer to an extraneous document in a pleading, and thus try to treat it as part of the pleading, was not proper pleading, and in my opinion that decision was quite right.—p. 362.

RIGBY, L.J.—In Smith v. Buchan, which was an action for specific performance of an agreement for the purchase of land, a motion was made for judgment on the statement of claim in default of defence. The statement of claim was defective in not describing the property clearly, but it was sought to supplement the statement of claim by referring to a document mentioned in it. Kay, J., refused to allow this to be done. He said that he could act only on the pleading as it stood.—p. 363.

BRETT, L.J.—In those cases [Whistler v. Hancock and Wallis v. Hepburn] the Court had no jurisdiction to do what they were asked to do, because there had been no order in either of those cases to enlarge the time for appealing against the order dismissing the action, and that order existing and having taken effect the cause was dead. In Burke v. Rooney, however, a different course was pursued, and there application was made by the plaintiff, similar to that which has been made here, to extend the time for appealing against the order, so that he might afterwards get it varied or set aside, and it was held that there was jurisdiction to extend the time. I am clearly of opinion that the decision in that case was right, although Whistler v. Hancock and Wallis v. Hepburn were also rightly decided.—p. 120.

Laird v. Briggs (1881) 19 Ch. D. 22; 45 L. T. 238.—C.A. JESSEL, M.R., BRETT and COTTON, L.JJ.

BRETT, L.J.—Two amendments were asked from the Court below, one of which I think ought to have been granted, which is the material one in the present case, and the other I think ought not. I do not think the learned judge exercised his discretion with regard to the facts of this particular case, but declined to allow both the amendments upon a particular view which he took of the meaning of the decision in Newby v. Sharpe. Now, I think the decision in Newby v. Sharpe was a strong authority against the second amendment which was asked for, but was no authority against the first, which I think ought to have been allowed. I therefore venture to disagree with the learned judge, not upon a mere question of discretion exercised with regard to the facts of this particular case, but on his declining to amend upon a particular view of Newby v. Sharpe.—p. 34.

Budding v. Murdoch (1875) 1 Ch. D. 42; 45 L. J. Ch. 213; 24 W. R. 23.—JESSEL, M.R.

The M.R. said that the case now set up by the plaintiff was not raised by the bill; and if the suit had come to a hearing before the recent Act, the question whether the plaintiff should be allowed to amend would have required just consideration, having regard to the decision in Darnley (Earl) v. L. C. & D. Ry. Under the circumstances, he thought the new practice ought to be applied, and that the plaintiff ought to have liberty to amend; and he made an order accordingly, with liberty for the defendant to put in a further answer, and both parties to go into further evidence.

SELWYN, L.J.—There the original bill was filed to redeem a mortgage, and it was held that the bill could not properly be amended by stating the subsequent acquisition of title. In all the other cases which have been cited there was an original defect in the plaintiff's title, which it was sought to cure by the introduction of statements of fact which occurred after the bill was filed. But in the present case the title of the Att.-Gen. does not in any degree depend upon the contract between the Commissioners and the defendants. He sues as representing the public by an original independent title, namely, as protector of the rights of the public against a nuisance to the public highway.—p. 110.

Noyes*, he altered this opinion on the ground that the defendant might not be able to show who was the heir, though he might prove that the plaintiff was not.—p. 740.

Accordingly, I cannot treat that as being any authority upon this point. Roe v. Davies (1876) 2 Ch. D. 729; 23 W. R. 606.

BACON, V.-C.—The old practice was perfectly well understood. It had been the subject of consideration in Watts v. Hyde, in which case Knight Bruce, L.J., thought fit at the hearing of the case to give the plaintiff, under the circumstances, leave to amend the bill (see King v. Corke); but Lord Cottenham discharged the order. The inconvenience and imperfection of the old practice was made so manifest on that occasion that no one can wonder that a remedy has at length been applied to this defect. And here a very extensive authority has been conferred on the Court, which is enabled to allow either party to alter his statement of claim, "at any stage of the proceedings," without any limitation except the discretion of the judge.—p. 733.

LINDLEY, M.R. (for the Court).—The use of the expression "reasonable cause of action" in r. 4 [Ord. XXV.] shows that the summary procedure there introduced is only intended to be had recourse to in plain and obvious cases. The authorities collected in the Annual Practice show that the Courts have always so construed r. 4, although sometimes, no doubt, a statement of claim may be so long and the facts so complicated that considerable time and attention are required to ascertain their true result, as in *Peru Republic v. Knowles v. Roberts (1888) 38 Ch. D. 263; 58 L. T. 259.—C.A. COTTON, LINDLEY and BOWEN, L.JJ.

BOWEN, L.J.—We have been referred to a passage from the judgment of James, L.J., in Watson v. Rodwell, that in matters within the discretion of the judge of first instance, the C.A. would not overrule that discretion. But when it was urged before that learned judge in the subsequent case of Davy v. Garrett, on the authority of Watson v. Rodwell, that where the V.-C. had exercised his discretion the C.A. would not interfere with it, James, L.J., made the following observations: "The argument was strongly pressed upon us that this was an appeal from a matter lying within the discretion of the judge, and an observation of my own in Watson v. Rodwell was relied on. I do not know whether my expressions were stronger than was required; but it is very important that time and money should not be wasted on appeals on interlocutory matters, and I have therefore always set my face against appeals from the discretion of the judge in matters of procedure. But a defendant may claim ex debito justitiæ to have the plaintiff's case presented in an intelligible form, so that he may not be embarrassed in meeting it." The power which is given to the judge of first instance by this rule ought to be exercised in a fit case.—p. 271.

MELLISH, L.J.—In Golding v. Wharton Salt Works Co., which was the first case before us, we held that striking out pleadings was a matter of discretion, and that, except in very extreme cases, or where the judge has adopted a wrong principle, we should not interfere with that discretion.—p. 383.

BAGGALLAY, L.J.—In those cases [Golding v. Wharton Salt Works Co. and Watson v. Rodwell (supra, col. 2495)] no doubt the Court refused to interfere with the exercise of a mere discretion, but the present case was determined upon principle, the Court deciding as matter of law that these defences ought not to be pleaded together.—p. 304.

WIGHTMAN, J. to the same effect.

CROMPTON, J.—If Cutts v. Surridge is to be taken to have established that, in all cases where there is a demurrer to a plea containing an immaterial traverse, the defendant may put the plaintiff to the alternative of having the demurrer set aside as frivolous, or the immaterial allegation struck out of the declaration, I should hesitate before I assented to it. There is great reason to doubt the sufficiency of the grounds of that decision, but it may possibly be supported for the reason mentioned by Lord Campbell.—ibid.

ROMER, J.—The Court has an inherent power to prevent the abuse of its legal machinery, as was well observed by Bowen, L.J., in Willis v. Beauchamp (Earl) (supra, col. 2497), where after pointing out that in that case the application to strike out the statement of claim was not made under the rule, he says: "The rules, as we have pointed out more than once, do not, and that particular rule does not, deprive the Court in any way of the inherent power which every Court has to prevent the abuse of legal machinery." Undoubtedly, in a proper case, the Court has power to strike out a statement of claim which the Court considers is an abuse of the legal machinery of the Court. That power is not confined to a statement of claim. It applies to every pleading, and that it applies to defences is shown by Reichel v. Magrath, to which my attention has been called. Further, it appears to me that the Court may receive evidence on a motion of this kind for the purpose of showing, but only for the purpose of showing, that any pleading complained of and sought to be struck out is an abuse of the process of the Court. If authority were wanted for that proposition, it is given by Biswell v. Chaks (1894) 6 R. 167, supra, col. 2440; and I think that the present case is one where the plaintiff is entitled by his evidence to state the circumstances which show that the defence is merely an abuse.—p. 526.

COTTON, L.J.—But the jurisdiction of the Court to prevent its process being abused, and to prevent actions being brought which are mere vexation, is original and does not depend on the general orders of the Court. That jurisdiction is recognised by the House of Lords in Metropolitan Bank v. Pooley, a case which was relied on by Mr. Pearson, who said that the House of Lords held the question to be whether on the statements contained in the statement of claims there was any good ground of action. But undoubtedly though they did consider that question, they did not limit the jurisdiction of the Court to cases where the pleadings show no right of action in the plaintiff.—p. 231.

LORD WATSON (for LORDS HOBHOUSE and MORRIS, SIR R. COUCH and MR. SHAND (LORD SHAND)).—Their lordships hold it to be settled that a Court of competent jurisdiction has inherent power to prevent abuse of its process, by staying or dismissing, without proof, actions which it holds to be vexatious. In Metropolitan Bank v. Pooley (supra, col. 2498), the Lord Chancellor (the Earl of Selborne), speaking with reference to the dismissal of an action on that ground, said that—"The power seemed to be inherent in the jurisdiction of every Court of justice to protect itself from the abuse of its own procedure." The same principle was again laid down by the House of Lords in Lawrance v. Norreys (Lord). In that case the A. C. had refused to allow proof, and dismissed the action, and Lord Herschell observed:—"It cannot be doubted that the Court has an inherent jurisdiction to dismiss an action which is an abuse of the process of the Court. It is a jurisdiction which ought to be very sparingly exercised, and only in very exceptional cases." In the remarks made by Lord Herschell, as to the caution with which the power of summary dismissal on such grounds ought to be exercised, their lordships unhesitatingly concur.—p. 68.

LINDLEY, L.J.—There is no doubt that what Romer, J., has done is a very unusual thing. It is a strong thing to say, and it cannot be said as a general proposition, that a defendant is not at liberty to put in a defence denying the allegations in the statement of claim. Of course, he is entitled to do so as a general rule. The learned judge is quite right. He recognises the rule illustrated by Hildige v. O'Farrell. In a case of that kind the Court will not try whether the matters alleged in a defence are true or false; but the ground of his decision in this case is that the defence is a mere sham.—p. 528.

V. WILLIAMS, J.—I have only to say, with regard to that case, that it is no decision whatever upon the general law. The action was an action in which, according to the law of Scotland, one person is allowed, if he chooses, to represent the public; and apparently, according to the law of Scotland, the result of that action binds the public at large. All that the H. L. decided was that such a result would not bind the public at large unless it was a result arrived at after judicial consideration, and that it would not bind the public if it was a result arrived at by consent, and a fortiori if such consent was a purchased consent. The decision does not seem to me to touch this matter at all.—p. 45.

FIELD, J.—Lumsden v. Winter differs from the present case, because no reply had been delivered; the pleadings at that stage were practically closed, and there were materials upon which the judgment could be maintained. COTTON, L.J.—The contention for the present plaintiffs is that whenever the claim of a plaintiff is admitted, he is entitled to have the money paid into Court. I cannot agree to that argument: a plaintiff is not entitled to have the money paid into Court, unless the counter-claim is frivolous and unsubstantial. I agree with the reasons and with the judgment of the Q. B. D. In Showell v. Bournon there may have been some special reason for granting the order, and in that case the decision will be right; but it seems to me that if the decision cannot be supported upon that ground, it was wrong.—p. 532. JAMES, L.J.—In Bennett v. Moore, Hall, V.-C., following the course adopted by the M.R. in other cases, upon a motion under Ord. XL r. 11, founded on admissions of fact in the answers, made an order amounting to a full decree for execution of the trusts of a settlement, with inquiries as to parties and accounts, and an order that a defaulting trustee should pay money into Court, and adjourned the further hearing of the cause without requiring any further prior hearing than the motion. The view thus adopted by other branches of the Court seems to me consistent with the spirit of the rules, and I think the course taken by the M.R. and Hall, V.-C. should be now followed.—p. 688.

ELLENBOROUGH, C.J. (for the Court).—Lord Mansfield is made to say, in Grove v. Dubois, "that a commission del credere is an absolute engagement to the principal from the broker, and makes him liable in the first instance, that there is no occasion for the principal to communicate with the underwriter, though the law allows the principal for his benefit to resort to him as a collateral security." Some expressions nearly similar, and probably founded on them, have fallen from other judges in Houghton v. Matthews (3 Bos. & P. 489). With all the respect which is due to Lord Mansfield and those judges, we cannot accede to these propositions thus generally laid down without restriction or qualification. The doctrine contained in them, as so laid down, appears to us to reverse the relative situations of principal and factor, and to have a tendency to introduce uncertainty and confusion into the law on this subject.—p. 574.

SMITH, M.R.—Now this case is not like Turner v. Goldsmith, where the agent's remuneration was by commission. In such a case the employer must not prevent the agent from earning his commission. In this case the plaintiff had been serving the defendants as representative salesman for some time before the contract in question was entered into. The defendants agree to continue the plaintiff in their employment for four years and to pay him a salary of 200*l.* or 250*l.* a year, no more and no less. That is all this contract provides for. There is to be no payment by commission.—p. 899.

PAGE-WOOD, L.J.—The solicitor had been employed by Mr. Neville as solicitor, and also as receiver of his rents. . . . He was also employed in specific operations for raising money on mortgage and by discounting bills. . . . The circumstances in White v. Lincoln (Lady) were quite different. Lord Eldon there pointedly rests his judgment on Jackson's being the Duke's general agent, bound in duty to him to keep regular accounts of his money transactions, and the same principle is indicated in Lord Rosslyn's previous order. The principle is founded on this, that, when you employ a man as general agent, he can receive money to an amount which you have no means of finding out unless he keeps regular accounts of his receipts and payments. So here, if no account of the rents had been furnished, Lee must have been charged with the full amount of the rental, and would have had to discharge himself. But the case is very different when a solicitor is employed to raise money by mortgage or by discounting a bill. The client there is aware of the whole transaction, and knows what the solicitor receives.—p. 45.

MELLISH, L.J.—I think we do not at all overrule the case of Turnbull v. Garden, because, as I understand it, in that case the party from whom the discount was taken was not in the position of Messrs. Baring, but was an agent for somebody else. The real brokers were willing to allow a discount, and then the question was whether the next agent could keep it in his own pocket, or was bound to give it to the principal, which was an entirely different question.

TURNER, L.J.—Phillips v. Phillips went upon the footing of the account there in question being a current account between the parties, and the bill made no case of general agency, alleging only an isolated agency transaction connected with the sale by the defendant of some railway shares belonging to the plaintiff. That case had no reference to a case of general account between principal and agent; and if his language in giving judgment in that case had been in fact such as to give rise to misapprehension, such misapprehension ought to have been dispelled by what he had said in the subsequent case of Padwick v. Stanley (9 Hae 623), when adverting to the want of correlation between the rights of a principal and an agent to sue in Chancery.—p. 654.

COTTON, L.J.—It was said that in that case, after the transaction had been completed, so that the sale and purchase could not be set aside, relief was granted, and the judgment was approved by the House of Lords. But if we look at the judgment in that case it assumes throughout a setting aside of the transactions which were impeached, and it was a case where that could be done.—p. 686.

BRUCE, J.—Frixione v. Tagliaferro . . . has little or no bearing on the present case. . . . It appeared that the agent [in that case] communicated, at every step in the action brought against him at Genoa, with the respondents and acted with their approval; that he treated the action as their action and defended it for them; and that the respondents approved of his conduct on their behalf . . . the principals in that case had authorised their agent to defend the proceedings in that Court, and so had rendered themselves liable for the consequences resulting from the judgment of the Court. In the present case the plaintiff has failed, in my opinion, in making out a good cause of action against the defendants.—p. 92.

● ESHER, M.R.—The present case is, in my opinion, clearly distinguishable from Duncan v. Hill. In the present case the plaintiff, a member of the London Stock Exchange, was instructed by the defendant to enter into bargain on the Stock Exchange for the purchase of certain stock and shares for the defendant. . . . The shares and stocks in question had been carried over to the 14th of October, but before that day—namely, on the 12th of October—the plaintiff became a defaulter on the Stock Exchange. . . . The defendant, instead of throwing over the plaintiff as his broker by dealing directly with the jobbers himself, or by selecting another broker, elected to treat the plaintiff as still acting as his broker, and so altered the circumstances of the plaintiff by continuing the plaintiff's liability to the jobbers. There was therefore a new contract between the defendant and the plaintiff, under which the defendant was bound to indemnify the plaintiff: or, if you will, the old contract to the same effect was left standing. . . . That being so, this case is the same as the ordinary case, and the defendant . . . is bound to indemnify the plaintiff. p. 189.

Blackburn v. Vigors (1887) 57 L. J. Q. B. 114;

LORD HALSBURY, L.C.—Whatever may be said of the logic of that case [Gladstone v. King], which acquitted the captain of all ill intention but decided upon the ground that otherwise owners might direct their captains to remain silent, and which upon a policy lost or not lost assumes any antecedent damage to have been an implied exception out of the policy—it does not proceed upon any such ground as the C. A. appeared to rely on here. . . . I can quite understand that . . . the owner of the ship cannot escape the necessity of being acquainted with his ship and its history because he has committed to others—his captain or his general agent for the management of his shipping business—the knowledge which the underwriter has a right to assume the owner possesses when he comes to insure his ship. With respect to agency so limited, I am not disposed to differ with the proposition laid down by Chief Justice Cockburn in Proudfoot v. Montefiore. A part of this proposition is "that the insurer is entitled to assume as the basis of the contract between him and the assured, that the latter will communicate to him every material fact of which the assured has, or in the ordinary course of business ought to have, knowledge." I think these last words are the cardinal words, and contemplate such an agency as I have described above. I am unable, however, to see that the present case is governed by any such principle. A broker is employed to effect a particular insurance. While so employed he receives material information; he does not effect the insurance, and he does not communicate the information. How is it possible to suggest that the assured could rely upon the communication to the principal of every piece of information acquired by any agent through whom the assured has unsuccessfully endeavoured to procure an insurance? . . . In this case, I think the agency of the broker had ceased before the policy sued upon was effected.
 The principal himself, and the broker through whom the policy sued on was effected, were both admitted to be unacquainted with any material fact which was not disclosed. I cannot but think that the somewhat vague use of the word
 "agent" leads to confusion. Some agents so far represent the principal that in all respects their acts and intentions and their knowledge may truly be said to be the acts, intentions, and knowledge of the principal. . . . In Fitzherbert
v. Mather the consignor and shipper of the goods insured was the agent whose knowledge was in question. In Gladstone v. King the master of the ship was the agent; and in Proud- foot v. Montefiore the agent was the accepted representative of the principal in effect trading and acting for him. . . .—p. 117.

(for the Court).—Although the opinion was expressed in that case that it was not the duty of the agents to communicate to their principals the information which they had received, we take that opinion as applying to the particular facts before the House, which showed that before the negotiation for the policy sued upon had commenced, all connection of the plaintiff with his former brokers had ceased; and we cannot suppose it would be intended to apply to the facts proved in the present case, which showed that, so far from the connection with the principals and their brokers ceasing, the brokers used the name of the principals to continue the negotiation, and the principals adopted this act, and themselves continued and carried out what their brokers had commenced.—p. 482.

FRY, J.—I think . . . that the law stands as it certainly stood before that case, that a person who owes money to an agent, knowing him to be an agent, must pay in that manner as to facilitate the agent in transmitting the money to his principal, and the payer cannot pay that agent by a settler at the account, in which the payer himself gets the benefit of the payment, as took place in this case.—p. 207.

There the payment was made to a person entitled to receive it in respect of the moneys which the person clearly in it was paid was entitled to receive on at to whom his principal and in respect of the amount of he was so entitled to receive. The only question which arose there was because the payment included other moneys, and was made by a crossed cheque; but it was held that the payment was not the less one in cash payment authorised, merely because it included other moneys, or because it was paid by a crossed cheque which was duly cashed.—p. 601. sed

JAMES, L.J.—There is no ground whatever for the contention that the case has anything to do with Robinson v. Mollett, where a broker was selling his own goods to his principal. This is the ordinary common case of a broker employed by a person who is speculating on the Stock Exchange, and authorised by his client to pay his losses, and actually paying them.—p. 212.

bound. In this case we are dealing with the custom of the Stock Exchange, with which all the parties must be taken to be cognisant. I give no opinion whether in any future case that may arise that will make any difference, and I will treat this case as though the principle laid down in Robinson v. Mollett applied. I have come to the opinion that the difficulty raised in that case does not exist in the one before us. When it came to the last carrying over, which is the only one we are concerned with, it was a purchase by the broker on behalf of his principal of the shares that were carried over.

ROMER, L.J.—I would add one remark about what was said with reference to certain statements made by Lord Chelmsford in Robinson v. Mollett about a mere intention of appropriation not establishing privity. I think that the effect that was sought to be given to that statement of Lord Chelmsford, as if it were a decision that the intention was always immaterial, cannot be supported for the reason given during the argument, that the appropriation in that case would have involved the taking of a part out of the whole bulk.

BIGHAM, J.—With much of that [the judgment of Kennedy, J. in the above case] I entirely agree, but I do not agree with the view that there is no contract created. In my opinion a contract was created in Beckhusen v. Hamblet. . . . That case went to the C.A., and the appeal was dismissed on the ground that the existence of the alleged usage had not been established; the C.A., however, said that the decision was not to prejudice the right of the plaintiffs to raise the question of the existence and validity of the usage in another action.

BRETT, M.R.—It is argued that . . . in *Ireland v. That is no doubt a high authority; but Lord Blackburn has never said that as long as the contract of principal and agent remains executory the principal can sue the agent as though the contract were one of purchase and sale, and as though the parties to it were in the relation of vendor and purchaser.—p. 541.

COTTON, J.J.—Now there is nothing in the Companies Act expressly requiring that the memorandum and articles must be signed by the subscribers with their own hands, but it is contended by the appellant that the Act, according to its true construction, requires personal signature. Sect. 6 of the Companies Act, 1862, provides that "any seven or more persons associated for any lawful purpose may by subscribing their names to a memorandum of association and otherwise complying with the requisitions of this Act in respect of registration, form an incorporated company;" and by sect. 11 it is provided that the memorandum of the association "shall be signed by each subscriber in the presence of, and attested by, one witness at the least." The appellant contends that as nothing is said in the statute about signature by an agent, these expressions must mean that the signature is to be affixed by the subscriber himself. In support of this Hyde v. Johnson is referred to. That case, I think, was decided on the special ground that the enactment which the Court was then considering was one of a series of enactments which made a distinction between a man's signing by himself and signing by an agent, and it was therefore considered that where signature by an agent was not mentioned the Act required signature by the man himself. That may be quite right, but in the present case the enactment we have to construe is not one of a series of enactments some of which refer to a signature by an agent, and I think it would be wrong to hold that an enactment simply referring to signature is not satisfied by signature by means of an agent.

BAGGALLAY, L.J.—If the dicta in Thomson v. Davenport are to be taken as strictly correct, they certainly go a long way to support the defendant's contention. But it is to be observed that they were mere dicta, and quite unnecessary to the decision. The largeness of those dicta has since then been dissented from by Parke, B., in the case of Heald v. Kenworthy, and with that dissent I entirely agree. . . . But reliance is placed upon the case of Armstrong v. Stokes, as establishing the doctrine that the buyer is released from liability if he pays the agent at a time at which the seller still gives credit to the agent. And it is contended that, as that state of facts existed here, the defendants are accordingly discharged. But I think that is not the true view of the decision in Armstrong v. Stokes. It must be accepted with reference to the particular circumstances of that case. There, at the time of the payment by the principal to the brokers, the sellers still give credit to the brokers, and to the brokers alone.—p. 418.

JESSEL, M.R.—No doubt there is a well-known principle of equity which has been laid down, sometimes by the Courts of equity and sometimes by the Courts of common law, for the purpose of that is the same in both Courts, that if the defendant has been misled by the plaintiff, either by his words or by his conduct, to believe that which is not true, so that his position is altered, the plaintiff cannot be heard to deny the truth of what he has thus led the defendant to believe. This is well laid down in Irvine v. Watson. In that case the defendants had paid the broker, and the question was whether that discharged their liability to the plaintiff. Bramwell, L.J. says, "I think it is impossible to say that it discharged them, unless they were led by some conduct of the plaintiff into the belief that the broker had already settled with the plaintiff, and made such payment in consequence of such belief." Now, assuming that there is no distinction in this respect between a partnership and a case of principal and agent, that observation applies exactly to this case. The payment which the defendant made was not made in consequence of being misled by the plaintiff. The mere fact that by the conduct of the plaintiff he lost the opportunity of getting the money back is not sufficient (p. 627). . . . All the judges agreed in laying down that where the seller knows that there is a principal behind the person with whom he is dealing, he must be shown to have himself done something which raises an equity against him, otherwise the principal is not discharged; though I am far from saying that there may not be special cases in which mere delay on the part of the plaintiff would be held to be sufficiently misleading conduct, it may amount to a representation that he has been paid. The case of Smethurst v. Mitchell is an authority that where the goods are not to be delivered till the account is paid, and yet the goods are delivered, whether the seller takes a bill of exchange or not, the seller cannot afterwards come upon the principal. The conduct of the seller would be treated as evidence of payment—it would be conduct which would naturally lead men of business to believe that the money had been paid (p. 628). . . . Both in that case and in Heald v. Kemworthy, it is said that there must be a change of position between the principal and agent caused by the conduct of the seller.—p. 629.

ARCHIBALD, J. (for the Court).—The Court in Priestley v. Fernie held that where an agent, who has made a contract in his own name, has been sued on it to judgment, even without satisfaction, no second action would be maintainable against the principal; but it is clear from the language used by Bramwell, B., in delivering the judgment of the Court, that whilst it was considered that judgment against the agent, even without satisfaction, would constitute a conclusive election, yet that no legal proceedings short of judgment would have that effect, for he distinctly points out that by the word "sue" he meant "sue to judgment."

SELBORNE, L.C.—Curtis v. Williamson simply held that the mere act of making an affidavit of the kind which was made in this case in bankruptcy was not one as to which the party would have no locus penitentie under any circumstances, where he had been desirous, when he had fully considered the matter, of withdrawing it before it was put upon the file, and nothing was done, so far as appears, after it was put upon the file. There was nothing to bind him to his election except that inadvertent and (at the time when it was done) unintentional act of his agent; and the Court, who probably knew the facts of the case, were quite right in holding that that ought not to be regarded as an election by him.—p. 617.

WILLIAMS, L.J.—I am not sure that in Marsh v. Keating either the H. L. or the judges whose opinion was taken meant to decide either that ignorance and want of means of knowledge will exonerate a person through whose account a sum of money has passed from responsibility, or that knowledge of the fact is essential to liability. Nothing more seems to me to have been decided than that there the defendants could not rely upon ignorance if they had the means of knowledge.

[Fuller v. Wilson was reversed (3 Q. B. 1009); but the reversal proceeded not on any substantial disaffirmance of the judgment, but on the insufficiency of the statement of facts in the special verdict, which did not show the same state of things as that presented to the Court below.]

DENMAN, C.J. (for the Court).—On these facts, it was assumed at the trial that the recent case of Cornfoot v. Fowke was directly in point; on which supposition I thought myself bound by the authority of the Court of Exchequer to direct a verdict allowing the plaintiff to move for a new trial. It now likewise appears to the Court that on one point of view, that case is a direct authority bearing on the present, though the facts are not in all respects entirely similar. For it was then held by three of the learned Barons, in opposition to the opinion of Lord Abinger, that the plea of fraud was not sustained, because the plaintiff had made no representation, and the plaintiff's agent did not know his own representation to be false. If this be correct as to a plea of fraud, neither can the action for deceit lie under the same circumstances. Lord Abinger maintained, and surely not without reason, that there was some moral fraud in the conduct of both, the principal concealing a fact which made his house utterly unfit for the purpose for which he was letting it; the agent stating a falsehood, which, of course, he could not know to be true, even if he believed it. We do not, however, take this ground. We adopt the other proposition of the Chief Baron, namely, that whether there was fraud or not, if the purchaser was actually deceived in his bargain, the law will relieve him from it. We think the principal and his agent are for this purpose completely identified; and that the question is, not what was passing in the mind of either, but whether the purchaser was in fact deceived by them or either of them.—p. 66.

WILLES, J. (for the Court).—If there be fraud in the manager, then arises the question, whether it was such a fraud as the bank, his employers, would be answerable for. With respect to that, we conceive we are in no respect overruling the opinions of my brothers Martin and Bramwell in Udell v. Atherton, the case most relied on for the purpose of establishing the proposition that the principal is not answerable for the fraud of his agent. Upon looking at that case, it seems pretty clear that the division of opinion which took place in the Court of Exchequer arose, not so much upon the question whether the principal is answerable for the act of an agent in the course of his business—a question which was settled as early as Lord Holt's time (Hera v. Nichols, 1 Salk. 289)—but in applying that principle to the peculiar facts of the case ; the act which was relied upon there as constituting a liability in the sellers having been an act adopted by them under peculiar circumstances, and the author of that act not being their general agent in business, as the manager of a bank is. But with respect to the question, whether a principal is answerable for the act of his agent in the course of his master's business, and for his master's benefit, no sensible distinction can be drawn between the case of fraud and the case of any other wrong. The general rule is, that the master is answerable for every such wrong of the servant or agent as is committed in the course of the service and for the master's benefit though no express command or privity of the master be proved.—p. 265.

SIR MONTAGUE SMITH (for the Court).—It has been contended, however, that Western Bank of Scotland v. Addie, L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. 145, . . . is at variance with Barwick v. English Joint Stock Bank. Their lordships, however, do not so regard it. Mr. Addie alleged that he had been induced to take shares in the Western Bank of Scotland by fraudulent representations of its directors, and claimed to recover the value of his shares, or to be reimbursed the damages which he had sustained. After his purchase of the shares, and before he instituted his suit, the bank, which had been an unincorporated company under 7 Geo. 4, c. 67, was, with his concurrence, incorporated and registered under the Joint Stock Companies Act, 1856, for the purpose of being wound up. Upon these facts it was decided that Mr. Addie had no remedy against the new corporation which had been formed. Lord Cranworth observes : "He was a party to a proceeding whereby the company from which the purchase was made was put an end to—it ceased to be unincorporated, and became an incorporated company, with many statutable incidents connected with it, which did not exist before the incorporation. The new company is now in the course of being wound up.

... He comes too late; the appellants are not the persons who were guilty of the fraud, and although the incorporated company is by the express provisions under which it was incorporated made liable for the debts and liabilities incurred before the incorporation, I cannot read the statute as transferring to the incorporated company a liability to be sued for frauds or other wrongful acts committed by the directors before incorporation." The case was therefore decided upon a point which did not arise in the case of Barwick v. English Joint Stock Bank.—p. 413.

BRAMWELL, L.J.—But it is said that there is an exception to the rule that a man is only liable for fraud when it is actual fraud, and that, though not morally fraudulent himself, he is in some cases liable for the fraud of his agent; and for this Barwick v. English Joint Stock Bank and the cases following thereon are cited. I am not going to say that case is not law. In the first place we are bound by it; in the next it has been so much approved and followed that it has become part of the law; and lastly, it is undoubtedly a most convenient and useful rule that principals should be responsible for damage occasioned by the fraud of their agents acting within the scope of their authority, at least to the extent of the gains of the principal, especially now that so much of the world's business is carried on by corporations. But with all respect, be it said, the reasoning in Barwick v. English Joint Stock Bank is not satisfactory. Mr. Justice Willes says: "On the question whether a principal is answerable for the act of his agent in the course of his master's business and for his master's benefit, no sensible distinction can be drawn between fraud and any other wrong." Now, with all submission, there is a very obvious distinction. Fraud is always wilful; and a master, as a rule, is not liable for the wilful wrong of his servant. "The general rule," proceeds the learned judge, "is that the master is answerable for every such wrong of the servant or agent as is committed in the course of his service, and for the master's benefit, though no express command or privity of the master be proved. That principle is acted on every day in running down cases." The illustration is unfortunate, for it is certain there is no such liability where the act of the servant is wilful. He then cites 7 C. B. 797, where the owner of a ship was held liable for a tortious conversion by the captain of part of the cargo by selling it. That case, however, was expressly decided on the ground that the captain was acting for the owner within the scope of his authority. A similar remark applies to the next case cited. The principle that such cases as these is not that the principal is held liable for the acts of his servant. It is the responsibility of the principal for the acts of his servants. For suppose the defendants had been, not a joint stock company, but a private partnership, they would (if the decision is right) have been liable. It seems to me, then, that Barwick v. English Joint Stock Bank cannot be supported on the reasons given. ... But, though doubting the reasoning on which it is formed (if one may say so without presumption), I think it may be supported on other grounds. It is important to put the case on its true grounds. I think that every person, who authorises another to act for him in the making of any contract, undertakes for the absence of fraud in that person in that execution of the authority given, as much as he undertakes for its absence in himself when he makes the contract. I retain the opinion I expressed in Udell v. Atherton (supra), and mean what I now say to be consistent with it.—p. 748.

FRY, J.—As a general rule, I think that one agent is not responsible for the acts of another agent, unless he does something by which he makes himself a principal in the fraud. It is said that that view of the law is inconsistent with the decision of the House of Lords in Peek v. Gurney, so far as it related to Mr. Barclay. . . . If that be not the principle of the decision in that case, it must, I think, be admitted that a totally new principle was introduced into the law. It would be impossible also to reconcile the decision with Weir v. Barnett, which seems to me a very important authority, as showing that the only persons who can be made responsible for a fraud are those who come within one or other of the two categories which I have mentioned. I entirely adopt the language of Bramwell, B. in Swift v. Jewsbury (L. R. 9 Q. B. 315), "No doubt there are cases in which a man may be charged with having committed a fraud when he has not committed it himself; but I think that that ought to be held in as few cases as possible."

LORD MERSCHALL.—In Weir v. Bell Lord Bramwell vigorously criticised the expression "legal fraud," and indicated a very decided opinion that an action founded on fraud could not be sustained except by the proof of fraud in fact. I have already given my reasons for thinking that, until recent times at all events, the judges who spoke of fraud in law did not mean to exclude the existence of fraud in fact, but only of an intention to defraud or injure.

COLLINS, M.R.—Swift v. Winterbotham [i.e., the above case] was one of a class of cases in which, before the Act of 1890, a bank was held to be liable for a false representation by its manager in the course of carrying on the business of the bank; but the decision did not rest on any doctrine of a holding out by the principal, but upon the principle that as the agent is chosen by the principal, the latter must take the risk of the agent acting beyond the express authority given to him.—p. 75.

BRUCE, J.—That case does not seem to me to govern the present. It was a decision upon the words of the 2nd section of the Factors Act (6 Geo. 4, c. 94) (repealed). The words there are "any contract . . . for the sale or disposition" of goods. The Court held that the word "disposition" in that section must mean "something in the nature of a sale." The phrase "any agreement for sale, pledge, or other disposition," is, I think, wider in its scope than the phrase "any contract for sale or disposition"; but even if I were to adopt the interpretation of the old Act, as applicable to the words of the Act of 1889, I should be prepared to hold that a delivery of goods on the terms that they should be sold by the person to whom they were delivered for the benefit of the person delivering them, was a "disposition," something in the nature of a sale.

WOOD, V.-C.—In that case [which was very different from the present] there was an arrangement by which Whitworth, the person buying in his own name, had become liable for Hodgson, the person for whom he bought, which liability would result in a debt due, as soon as Whitworth made the payment, from Hodgson, who pledged the goods to Whitworth, the broker, who had so pledged his credit. But the money not having been yet actually paid, the broker, not having funds to make the payment, went to a third person, Clare. Whitworth, who held the same position there that Gorst does here, did not say to Hodgson, "Give me the cotton, that I may raise the money and free myself from the liability," but wanting to raise money for the purpose of paying this liability, he went to Clare with the documents of title, Clare having no antecedent claim against Hodgson, and being under no obligation to provide for the payment, and, with the consent of the principal, asked Clare to advance this money; Clare agreed to do this upon having the securities, and they were put into Whitworth's hands for the purpose of being handed to Clare, and for the purpose of raising this money. It was with reference to that part of the case that I made the observations, upon which Mr. Kay relied, at p. 702 of the report of Jewan v. Whitworth.—p. 323.

LORD BRAMWELL.—There are in this case three things which did not exist in the case cited. There is privity between the plaintiffs and the defendants, there is existing property or rights of possession in the plaintiffs when notice was given to the defendants, and there is the right given to the plaintiffs by sect. 7 of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 39 [Factors Act]. . . I wish to add that in the report of my judgment in New Zealand Co. v. Watson, the words "produce of goods" did not "get in by mistake." I said and think as reported on the authority of cases then cited by Mr. Barnes. But there there was no privity, and before notice to the then defendants the "produce" was blended in the general account with the intermediate man Thielman.—pp. 67, 68.

 Shenstone v. Hilton (1894) 63 L. J. Q. B. 584; [1894] 2 Q. B. 452; 10 R. 390; 71 L. T. 339.

BRUCE, J.—The case of Hastings v. Pearson which was cited by the plaintiffs' counsel, seems to me to have no application to the present case [which arose under s. 9 of the Factors Act, 1889]. The point there raised related solely to the construction to be put upon the 2nd section of the Act.

Lee v. Butler (1893) 62 L. J. Q. B. 591; [1893] 2 Q. B. 318; 4 R. 563; 69 L. T. 370; 42 W. R. 88.—C.A., distinguished. Helby v. Matthews (1895) 64 L. J. Q. B. 465; [1895] A. C. 471; 11 R. 232; 72 L. T. 841; 43 W. R. 561; 60 J. P. 20.—H.L. (E.).
 HERSCHELL, L.C.—Reliance was placed on the decision in Lee v. Butler, and it was said that the present case was not in principle distinguishable from it. There seems to me to be the broadest distinction between the two cases. There was there an agreement to buy. The purchase-money was to be paid in two instalments; but as soon as the agreement was entered into there was an absolute obligation to pay both of them, which might have been enforced by action. The person who obtained the goods could not insist upon returning them and so absolve himself from any obligation to make further payment. Unless there were a breach of contract by the party who engaged to make the payments, the transaction necessarily resulted in a sale. That there was in that case an agreement to buy appears to me, as it did to the Court of Appeal, to be beyond question.—p. 468.

Hull Ropes Co. v. Adams (1895) 65 L. J. Q. B. 114; 73 L. T. 446; 44 W. R. 108.—GRANTHAM and WRIGHT, JJ.

GRANTHAM, J.—We have now seen that judgment in Helby v. Matthews (supra) and are of opinion that this case is not governed by that decision, but is within the decision of the Court of Appeal in Lee v. Butler, which case is in fact affirmed by the House of Lords in Helby v. Matthews. The agreement in question is ill-expressed, but it appears to us to contain an irrevocable promise by the hirer to pay 4*l.* a month until the full price of 15*l.* 5*s.* is paid, and when the 15*l.* 5*s.* has been paid, the rope thereupon becomes the property of the hirer. Various contingencies are named in which the owner may put an end to the arrangement for sale, but there is nothing corresponding to the provision on which the decision of the House of Lords in Helby v. Matthews appears to have turned—there “the hirer may terminate the hiring by delivery up to the owner the said instrument.” We therefore think that in the present case the hirer had agreed to buy the rope within the meaning of the Factors Act, 1889.—p. 116.

Rayner v. Grote (1846) 15 M. & W. 359; 16 L. J. Ex. 79.—EX.

ALDERSON, B. (for the Court).—And it may be observed that this case is really distinguishable from Bickerton v. Burrell, on the very ground on which that case was decided; for here, at all events, before action brought and trial had, the defendant knew that the plaintiff was the principal in the transaction. Perhaps it may be doubted whether that case was well decided on such a distinction, as it may fairly be argued that it would have been quite sufficient to prevent any possible inconvenience or injustice, and more in accordance with former authorities, if the Court had held that a party named as agent under such circumstances as existed in that case, was entitled, on showing himself to be the real principal, to maintain the action, the defendant being, however, allowed to make any defence to which he could show himself to be entitled either as against the plaintiff or as against the person named as principal by the plaintiff in the contract. It is not, however, necessary for us, in the present case, to question the authority of that decision.—p. 366.

Hardy* (infra, col. 2558)], with some very special exceptions which have no application here, no person can be sued upon an instrument under seal, made inter partes, who is not a party to the deed; and where a deed is executed by one person on behalf of another, either he must, in order to bind that other person, execute it, either using the name of his principal, or he must employ such words as show that he executed it, not as himself a party to the deed, but as the agent, in the act of executing it, of his principal. The form of words is immaterial if in substance this is done.—p. 153.

JAMES, L.J.—The ratio decidendi in Paice v. Walker was that having regard to the contract and all the circumstances of the case, the words "as agents" must be considered as merely describing or intimating the fact that the defendants were agents, and did not amount to a statement that they are making a bargain "on account of" another person. . . . As to Paice v. Walker, I cannot conceive that the words "as agents" can be properly understood as implying merely a description. The word "as" seems to exclude that idea. If that case were now before us, I should hold that the words "as agents," in that case, had the same effect as the words "on account of" in the present case, and that the decision in that case ought not to stand. I do not dissent from the principle that a man does not relieve himself from liability upon a contract by using words which are intended to be merely words of description; but I do not think the words "as agents" are words of description.—p. 359.

MELLISH, L.J. (for the Court : JAMES and MELLISH, L.JJ.)—Now, although I have found no case at law, there is a case in equity which clearly shows that the rule in this Court is that a person cannot be made liable for making a misrepresentation unless it is a misrepresentation in point of fact. No suit can be maintained for making a misrepresentation in point of law. . . . The case I refer to is Rashdall v. Ford.—p. 806.
 [The decision in this case was, with an unimportant variation, affirmed by the House of Lords. See infra, col. 2556.]

ROMER, J.—It seems to me that the case of Firbank's Errors v. Humphreys is clearly distinguishable. There the directors contracted to issue certain debentures, and it turned out that they had no power to issue them. It was, therefore, not unnatural that the directors by issuing invalid debenture certificates were held to have implied and represented that they had authority to issue them when in fact they had no such authority. Here there were debentures which might have been made available for the purpose of the contract. I hold, therefore, that the defendant is not personally liable.

WILLIAMS, L.J.—If the subject-matter of the contract was the purchase of property . . . there was a larger matter which was the subject of the contract. That being the object of the contract, the mere fact that as an incident to it—not as the immediate object, but indirectly—the debt of another to a third person will be paid does not bring the case within the section. This definition or rule for ascertaining the kind of cases outside the section covers both “property cases” [i.e. cases such as those mentioned above] and “del credere cases.” . . . I wish to point out that Cockburn, C.J. was there [in Fitzgerald v. Dressler, infra] in terms dealing only with the “property cases” as an instance—and I think it is clear that he intended to deal with them only as an instance—of a general rule.

DENMAN, C.J. (for the Court).—The case most relied upon by the plaintiff is that of Thomas v. Cook, where this Court held that a promise of B. to hold A. harmless against the consequences of his entering with B. and C. at B.'s request, into a joint bond to indemnify D. against debts due from C. to D. was binding, though not in writing: Bayley, J., and Parke, J., the only judges present, saying that a promise to indemnify does not fall within the words or policy of the statute. But the reasoning in this case does not appear to us satisfactory in support of the doctrine there laid down; which taken in its full extent would repeal the statute.—p. 458.

WILLIAMS, J.—In Thomas v. Cook it may be observed, that although Bayley, J. put it upon the question that the statute does not apply to a promise to indemnify, Lord Wensleydale, the only other judge in that Court, certainly does not put it at all upon that ground.—p. 382.

POLLOCK, C.B. (in EX. CH.).—There is a great distinction between the case of Green v. Cresswell and the present. MALINS, V.-C.—The point was originally decided by two of the most eminent judges known on the bench, sitting in banc, Mr. Justice Bayley and Mr. Justice Parke (afterwards Lord Wensleydale), in the case of Thomas v. Cook (supra), and they decided it upon the plainest principles of common sense and justice. I was therefore surprised to find that, in a later case of Green v. Cresswell, the same Court, constituted at that time of other judges, had taken a different view—and a view which, if it had been maintained, I should have followed very reluctantly, if I had been obliged to follow it at all. But I am happy to find that, the matter having been most carefully and elaborately considered in the case of Reader v. Kingham, when the full number of judges was present, the case of Green v. Cresswell was considered, and was overruled, and the law, as laid down by Thomas v. Cook, restored. The learned judges commented upon those cases, and said that the law was accurately laid down in Thomas v. Cook. I entirely approve of that expression of opinion. I accordingly decide that, where a man induces another man to enter into an engagement by a promise to indemnify him against liability, an agreement of that nature is not within the Statute of Frauds, and does not require to be in writing. This is a case in which the father induced his son to guarantee the debt of his son-in-law, upon a promise that he would see him harmless. Upon every principle of justice he is bound to indemnify him, and I think, therefore, that the son is perfectly right in helping himself out of the estate which has come to his hands. The force of the decision in Reader v. Kingham was somewhat shaken by the opinion expressed by Blackburn, J. in Mountstephen v. Lakeman (L. R. 5 Q. B. 613). However I am glad to find that Mountstephen v. Lakeman was overruled, not only by the Court of Exchequer Chamber but in the House of Lords. Therefore, the law is restored to the plain and reasonable ground upon which it was put in Reader v. Kingham.—p. 343.

ERLE, C.J.—An important rule has been adopted with reference to this statute, that the promisee must be the original creditor. It was so held in Eastwood v. Kenyon, and again in Hargreaves v. Parsons. The rule has also been recognised in Fitzgerald v. Dressler, in this Court. The two cases cited from the Q.B., Green v. Cresswell, and Cripps v. Hartnoll, relate to bail for the default of another. The balance of authority is, that where the original creditor and the promisee are distinct persons, the promise does not fall within the statute.—p. 110.

STIRLING, L.J.—In Guild v. Conrad it was found that the contract was not to pay if the foreign firm did not pay, because there was no expectation at that time that the foreign firm would be able to pay, but the contract was to provide funds to enable the plaintiffs to meet certain acceptances. In the present case it seems to me that the transaction in contemplation was to give time to the syndicate in the expectation that in the interval they would be placed in funds by which they would be enabled to pay all their debts. The important element corresponding to that which existed in Guild v. Conrad, namely, the absence of any expectation that the syndicate would ever be able to pay is here wanting.

PATTESON, J.—Coe v. Duffield was cited in support of the rule on account of what was there said by Richardson, J., and, certainly, whatever fell from that learned judge would be great authority. There the guarantee was given on the 3rd of April, 1820, but on the 29th of March the defendant had written to the plaintiff that, feeling himself interested for Wilson (the principal debtor), he could not refrain from giving this security, if the plaintiff would agree to his terms, which were to allow Wilson two years to pay the whole sum by instalments, and accept the defendant's guarantee to see it paid in that time. Richardson, J., said:—"Not that the guarantee itself contained a consideration, but that the declaration might have been framed on the first letter—viz., that of the 29th of March—which was prior to the guarantee, and contained the terms on which the guarantee was to be given, and showed a sufficient consideration."—p. 1112.

LORD CHELMSFORD.—With regard, however, to Garrett v. Handley, it is to be observed that there it was impossible to separate the consideration into parts, and to make the party who was suing the person from whom the consideration alone moved. It was an advance of money which was to be made, not by him, but by the firm of which he was a member; it was a joint consideration in no manner separable, so as to apply any part of it to the separate partners. But in this case . . . the contract was clearly entered into with Agacio, the plaintiff, himself, although the benefit of it would result to the firm.—p. 170.

PARKE, B. (for the Court).—To allow one partner to bind another by contracts out of the apparent scope of the partnership dealings, because they were reasonable acts towards effecting the partnership purposes, would be attended with great danger. Could one of the defendants in this case have bound the others by a contract to lease or buy lands, or a coal mine, though it might be a reasonable mode of effecting a legitimate object of the partnership business. Our opinion is that one partner cannot bind the others in such a case, simply by virtue of the partnership relation. In the case of Ex parte Gardum, this point was not fully discussed, but given up by Sir S. Romilly, who had two other objections to the guarantee, on which he could rely, and on one of which he succeeded. Besides, we are not sufficiently informed by the report whether there might not have been some peculiar circumstances in the case which caused the abandonment of that point. We do not think that is an authority sufficient to establish the doctrine now contended for.—p. 630.

ROMILLY, M.R.—I think it a very startling thing to say, as the chief baron in effect does say there, that the words "I give you notice," mean "you receive notice." It is a very startling proposition, because, if so, if a stranger gave notice in the lifetime of guarantor that would be a sufficient notice to determine it. But surely that can hardly be meant. . . I am not disposed to follow Bradbury v. Morgan even in a case exactly similar, and certainly I shall not extend that case.—p. 313.

JAMES, L.J.—The testator (in this case), in my opinion, could not have determined the guarantee, and in that respect the case differs essentially from that of Coulthart v. Clementson, in which Bowen, J., followed the decision in Harris v. Fawcett (supra) with regard to the effect of death in determining a guarantee. In those cases there is this distinction (whether it is sufficient to sustain them or not) that each advance of goods was a separate consideration.—p. 314.

ROMER, J.—The case before me is exactly that referred to by Lord Justice (then Mr. Justice) Bowen in Coulthart v. Clementson, where he observes as follows: "If, indeed, the contracting parties desire that on the death of the guarantor a special notice shall be necessary to determine the guarantee, they can so provide in the guarantee itself and such a provision will, of course, bind the estate."

ALDERSON, B.—If I were obliged to choose between the two conflicting principles which have been laid down on this subject I should rather be disposed to agree with that given in Mason v. Pritchard, than with the opinion of Bayley, B., in Nicholson v. Paget.—p. 612.

Horlor v. Carpenter, (1858) 3 C. B. (N.S.) 172; 27 L. J. C. P. 1.—C.P.

[In *Nicholson v. BRAMWELL, B.—The only difficulty that I have arises from Oldershaw v. King. If we can understand two people agreeing, one to supply goods, and the other to be liable to a debt within a reasonable time, then there is some way of understanding that case; and I do not see why it is not to be understood to be applicable to a reasonable supply of goods; only we should have to find out somehow or other what that reasonable supply is. It is enough, however, to say that Oldershaw v. King was the case of a reasonable giving of time for payment of a debt, and by that, therefore, we are bound; but that did not determine what is a reasonable supply of goods from a manufacturer to a draper, and, therefore, it is not an authority in this case.—p. 268.

BRAMWELL, B.—Mr. Trevelyan says "withdraw" means "not to present or persevere in a petition against the company for the space of eighteen months"; and he says it must mean this, because if it only meant that the plaintiff would withdraw his petition for the moment, there would be no consideration and no valid contract. For this purpose he cites Ross v. Moss, which certainly goes very far; but whether that case is good law, and would be decided in the same way now, I will not say. If a man expressly contracts that on a particular petition being withdrawn he will pay a sum of money, that is a good contract; it was his own folly not to provide against another petition being filed. It is obvious that a real benefit is gained by the withdrawal, because of the disinclination to commence a new proceeding, after so much labour and expense have been wasted. I cannot but doubt, therefore, whether Ross v. Moss is good law, and I think that a promise made in consideration of such an agreement would be good.

BRETT, J.A.—But the law is, that a surety is only relieved if his position has been altered by the persons whom he is guaranteeing. There is no authority for saying he is released if his position is altered by any other means, unless Cooper v. Joel be such an authority. The rule has always been laid down with reference to the surety's position having been altered by the creditor; and the only point must be, whether that case does enlarge the rule. In my opinion it does not. In that case the liability of the defendant was only to arise if the condition was first performed, viz., that the sale should be postponed, and the persons guaranteed undertook that the sale should be postponed. True, the sale was stopped, not by their means, but by extraneous means; but they made the condition depend not upon what they should do, but upon what should be done. The case, therefore, is no authority to show that the ordinary examination of the rule is couched in too limited terms.

JAMES, L.J.—The form of the order in Turner, Ex parte, and the subsequent case of Rushforth, Ex parte, may easily be explained by reference to the then state of the law as regarded payments by sureties. As the law then stood a surety paying a debt after the bankruptcy had no means whatever of proving against the estate, though he was entitled to his remedy against the bankrupt, to whom the certificate was no discharge. That was the remedy of the surety, and it was, therefore, according to common sense and common equity for the principal creditors to claim the same rights, that is, the same dividend as they would have had if the surety had paid the debt after the bankruptcy, and before they themselves proved. But I cannot understand how that principle can apply to the case of a winding-up where the administration is exactly similar to that of the estate of a deceased person, and where it is of no consequence whatever at what time the surety paid the debt, his right of proof being the same whether he paid it at one moment or at another, the estate being liable to exactly the same amount of dividend in both cases.—p. 129. BLACKBURN, J.—I have now cited and examined every case [i.e., the above case and other cases infra] of which I am aware bearing on this subject. In every one of them the limited liability was to secure a floating balance, and I think the decisions establish that in such a case the suretyship is prima facie at least to be construed as a security for a part only of the debt. . . . But there is no case that I am aware of which lays down that where the suretyship, limited in amount, is for a debt already ascertained, which exceeds that limit, it is prima facie to be construed as a security for a part of the debt only. And I have failed to see any principle on which such a prima facie construction ought to be adopted. I think in such a case it is a question of construction on which the Court is to say whether the intention was to guarantee the whole debt with a limitation on the liability of the surety, or to guarantee a part of the debt only.—p. 30.

CHITTY, J.—For the defendants two cases were cited. The first was Wheatley v. Bastow. This is not an express decision on the point. . . . On the facts the Court decided that the surety was not discharged. But it seems to have been assumed throughout the case, both by the eminent counsel engaged and by the Court, . . . that, if the facts had shown a release the mortgaged property of the surety would have been discharged. The second case is Hodgson v. Hodgson. There it was held that the release of one co-surety discharged the security given by the other. This is in point. On principle, I can find no ground for the proposition that, although the surety's covenant is gone by alteration of the contract with the principal debtor, yet the security which the surety has given remains bound.

MANISTY, J.—It was contended by the counsel for the defendant, that Mrs. Rainbow, having been warned as she was by the defendant's solicitor that if she did not put a value on the policy she would discharge the defendant from his liability, by not doing so wilfully gave up or abandoned the policy, and so discharged the defendant from all liability as surety. In support of that contention they cited Polak v. Everett. In that case the complicated arrangement into which the parties had entered, and for the part performance of which the defendant had become surety, was substantially altered and varied without the defendant's consent. No doubt some dicta are to be found in the judgments of the judges in the Queen's Bench Division, which seem in the abstract to be in favour of the defendant in the present case, but the ratio decidendi in Polak v. Everett was that to which I have already adverted, and I do not think it is applicable to the present case. The Court of Appeal simply said they had no doubt that the view taken by the judges of the Queen's Bench Division was correct, and affirmed the judgment. I think this case is at the most one of neglect or omission to put a value upon the policy, assuming it to have some value, when Mrs. Rainbow proved her debt, and that in accordance with several authorities, including Wulff v. Jay, the defendant was only discharged from his liability as surety to the extent of the value of the policy.—p. 142.

HALL, V.-C.—Duncan, Fox & Co. v. North and South Wales Bank (infra, col. 2581) was decided by the Court of Appeal, who reversed the decision of Little, V.-C., and it afterwards went to the House of Lords, who, though they reversed the decision of the Court of Appeal (which had proceeded upon some supposed distinction between the ordinary case of suretyship and that of a suretyship arising out of a bill transaction), did not say anything which affected the principles laid down in the judgment of the Master of the Rolls, which is all I desire to notice in that case. I consider that the principle laid down in that case is perfectly plain and right, and also that the decision in Williams v. Owen must be now no longer considered as law after the cases to which I have referred. I decline to recognise it.—p. 694.

DENMAN, J.—I have felt great doubt whether I ought not to adhere to the doctrine laid down in Newton v. Chorlton, but, upon the whole, I think it more probable that Pledge v. Buss, though not raising the same point, contains the expression of the final opinion of the Courts of Equity (including that of Wood, V.-C.) than the decision of Newton v. Chorlton. I find that Newton v. Chorlton has been treated as overruled in the last three editions of White & Tudor's L. C., and I can see nothing unreasonable in the doctrine that a surety is discharged if the creditor has so dealt with any security he possesses that he cannot on payment by the surety give him all the securities he possesses, whether in existence at the time of the contract of suretyship or subsequently, in the same condition as they were when he first acquired them.

SELBORNE, L.C.—Therefore we are remitted to the question whether there was here an express or an implied contract to appropriate these monies in reduction of the secured or guaranteed debt. If there was, of course, that contract could not be defeated by any mode of keeping the account which the creditor might prefer: the contract must prevail: and in that case, no doubt, the principle of Pearl v. Deacon which dealt with securities (and I agree that moneys which by contract are appropriated to a particular purpose stand as regards the surety on the same footing as securities) would be applicable. [His lordship then went on to show that there was not in the case before him either an express or an implied contract to appropriate payments received subsequently to the termination of the guarantee towards the guaranteed debt.]

DENMAN, C.J. (for the Court).—This view cannot perhaps be made entirely consistent with all that is said by Lord Eldon in the case of Ex parte Gifford, where his lordship dismissed a petition to expunge the proof of a surety against the estate of a co-surety. But the principle to which we have adverted was not presented to his mind in its simple form, and the point certainly did not undergo much consideration. For some of the expressions employed would seem to lay it down that a joint debtor might release one of his debtors, and yet, by using some language of reservation in the agreement between himself and such debtor, keep his remedy entire against the others, even without consulting them. If Lord Eldon used any language which could be so interpreted, we must conclude that he either did not guard himself so cautiously as he intended, or that he did not lend that degree of attention to the legal doctrine connected with the case before him, which he was accustomed to afford.—p. 683.

PARKE, B. (for the Court).—Some remarks, indeed have been made by Lord Denman, in the case of Nicholson v. Revill, on the doctrine of Lord Eldon in Ex parte Gifford, throwing doubt on its correctness, on the supposition that Lord Eldon had held that a creditor could release one joint and several debtor, and hold another liable by a reserve of remedies; which would certainly be against the decision in Cheetham v. Ward (1 Bos. & P. 630), unless the instrument of release could, by reason of the context, be construed to be a covenant not to sue, as it was in the case of Solby v. Forbes (2 Brod. & B. 38). But we consider it clear that Lord Eldon meant only to apply the doctrine to cases where there was no release, but a composition, or giving time, not amounting to a release, which is the present case; and with reference to it, the rule laid down by Lord Eldon is not impeached by Lord Denman's remarks.—p. 136.

GIFFARD, V.-C.—The question in this case is, whether the plaintiff, who is a surety, is released or not. If he is released, of course he is entitled to an injunction; if he is not released, his bill must be dismissed. Now, the first and main authority relied upon on the part of the plaintiff is Webb v. Hewitt. I have only to say this, as to the decision in Webb v. Hewitt, that it seems to me to proceed entirely upon this view of the transaction, that there had been a contract between the principal debtor and the principal creditor that a certain transaction should amount to payment and to extinguishment; and, that being so, it renders it unnecessary to allude to that case further, for it has no application to the present.—p. 77.

LORD HATHERLEY.—Looking at the report of that case, I see exactly what occurred there. The discharge was not in the form in which it is here—that is to say, taking part payment and discharging the rest, but there was a purchase by the creditor of all the property of the principal debtor, and that property so acquired by the creditor was taken in discharge of the debt that was due to him; and though he said that there ought to have been in the deed that which there was not, namely, a clause reserving his rights against the surety, and that such a clause had been omitted by mistake, I held that, had it been there, the rule would not have been applicable to a case where it is impossible to say how much the debtor's estate was worth, or to say that it exceeded, or that it fell short of the amount of the debt in question. The creditor had taken it for what it was worth, and had taken it in satisfaction. Therefore, my lords, the questions which have been argued here could not possibly arise in such a case as that.

BLACKBURN, J.—In Chitty on Contracts, 473, 7th ed., it is said, "Before the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, it appears to have been held, that when the security is given to a house, e.g., to a banking house, and not to the members of the firm by name, the surety would continue liable, notwithstanding a change of partners"; citing Barclay v. Lucas, Metcalfe v. Bruin (12 East, 400), and per Cur., Chapman v. Beckington (3 Q. B. 703, 722). And in the note to the above passage it is said, "Burclay v. Lucas has been doubted (see 1 N. R. 42; 4 Taunt. 681); but it gives the true principle, viz., that if the words show an intention that the security should continue, notwithstanding the accession of a new partner, the surety shall be liable."

[Counsel for defendant urged that Burclay v. Lucas was entirely overruled by Weston v. Barton (4 Taunt. 673) and Simson v. Cooke (8 Moore, 588).]

BLACKBURN, J.—At all events, the case is treated as good law in the notes to Lord Arlington v. Meyrick (2 Wms. Saund. 414), and seems to have been accepted as such by Mr. Justice Patteson, in his edition of the work.—p. 563.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR.—But that case turned upon the particular nature of the recital.

The recital in that case was, that the party appointed had been appointed a postmaster for the space of six months; and there the bond was conditioned upon his duly performing the duties of the said office so long as he shall continue postmaster. . . . Looking at the true construction of the instrument, all the parts being taken together, it is clear that what they [the sureties] meant to bind themselves for was, for the holding of office during the time mentioned in the recital. But of course it is competent to parties to make themselves liable to a future appointment, if they think fit.

Yeomans v. Williams (1865) L. R. 1 Eq. 184 :
35 Beav. 130.

ROMILLY, M.R.—I am of opinion that the plaintiffs are entitled to redeem on payment of the principal, and interest thereon from the last day previous to the death of the testator, on which interest fell due. I do not understand it to be laid down in the case before Vice-Chancellor Wigram (Cross v. Sprigg), that a man may not let his house to his son-in-law, and at the same time say to him, "You may hold it rent free." Is there anything contrary to equity in this? and is there any technical rule that, as this would not release the son-in-law from the rent at law, it would not do so in equity? I think not. I think the case would come under another head of equity, namely, that where one man induces another to enter upon a certain course of action upon the faith of representations held out by him, he shall be compelled to make such representations good. Thus, if a man asks his son-in-law to take a house, and the latter says he is not rich enough, and the father-in-law then says that the son-in-law shall hold it rent free, or what is the same thing, that the father-in-law will pay the rent for him, I think that if the son-in-law acted on such representations the Court would compel the father-in-law to make them good. Moreover, the Vice-Chancellor suggests at the end of his judgment that there may be a difference between the case of a release of principal and of interest . . . Here only the interest is released, and I think the plaintiff is entitled to the decree I have already stated.—p. 185.

BLACKBURN, J.—As early as Rees v. Berrington, a case decided in 1795 by Lord Loughborough, it was held, on what certainly seems somewhat artificial reasoning, that where any time is given by a creditor to a principal debtor without the consent of the surety, the surety is in equity discharged, however short the time may be, on the ground that the giving of time interferes with the right which the surety has to come to the principal debtor to say, "I pay you the money, and require you, on my giving you a proper indemnity, to hand over all your right to me." If he did that, and it turns out that the creditor has, by giving time to the debtor, precluded himself from suing, and so deprived the surety of the right of suing in his (the creditor's) name, though for ever so short a time, it has been held to discharge the surety from his obligation. Lord Eldon, in Samwell v. Howarth (infra), cited in the notes to Rees v. Berrington, says :—"The rule is, that if a creditor, without the consent of the surety, gives time to the principal debtor, by so doing he discharges the surety—that is, time is given by virtue of positive contract between the creditor and principal, not where the creditor is merely inactive. And in the case put, the surety is held to be discharged, for this reason, because the creditor, by so giving time to the principal, has put it out of the power of the surety to consider whether he will have recourse to his remedy against the principal or not, and because he, in fact, cannot have the same remedy against the principal as he would have had under the original contract. . . . It has been truly stated that the renewal of these bills might have been for the benefit of the surety ; but the law has said that the surety shall be the judge of that, and that he alone has the right to determine whether it is or is not for his benefit. The creditor has no right—it is against the faith of his contract—to give time to the principal, even though manifestly for the benefit of the surety, without the consent of the surety." Such is the principle which Lord Eldon lays down ; I think it is impossible to read it without saying, with due respect for so great a judge, that it is based on highly technical reasoning, however accurate and strictly logical the reasoning may be. That the creditor who gives time to the principal without expressly reserving his right against the surety does not alter the rights of the surety, and so discharge him, is clear. But that time, given by a lenient creditor which, ninety-nine times out of a hundred, does not injure the surety should yet discharge him, is to my mind not justice, although established by Courts of Equity; and if in the course of the legislation which is contemplated it should be enacted, as is proposed, that where law and equity conflict, the rule of equity shall prevail, I, for one, shall be very reluctant to administer such a doctrine of equity as that I have mentioned. The law would have to adopt the doctrine, that giving of time discharges the surety unless the rights are saved. Now the whole ground of the doctrine there is that it is against good faith, that is against the duty of the creditor, that he injured the surety with his eyes open, that he did it in such a way that it was a breach of duty and good faith.—p. 794.

BLACKBURN, J.—However accurate and logical the reasoning [of Lord Eldon in the above case] may be, I must say, with all respect to so great a judge, that it is highly technical and artificial; but it is clear that a creditor who gives time to the principal debtor, without expressly reserving his right against the surety, does alter the right of the surety, and does discharge him from liability. Where time given by a creditor does not injure the surety, it seems to me unjust that he should be discharged. The whole ground of the doctrine that giving of time discharges the surety unless the rights are saved, is that such a proceeding is against good faith, that is, against the duty of the creditor; that he injured the surety with his eyes open, and that it was a breach of duty and good faith.—p. 284.

- HATHERLEY, L.C.—Undoubtedly, if we look to the earlier cases, amongst which I might cite especially Oakeley v. Pasheller, the principle is laid down very clearly that if you agree with the principal to give him time, it is contrary to that agreement that you should sue the surety, because if you sue the surety you immediately turn him upon the principal, and therefore your act breaks the agreement into which you have entered with the principal. It is not simply neglecting to sue the principal which would have any effect upon the surety, but there must be a positive agreement with the principal that the creditor will postpone the suing of him to a subsequent period. To show that this is the principle, we have only to refer to another class of cases, which, down to one very late case, clearly and distinctly established that it is competent to the creditors to reserve all rights against the surety, in which case the surety is not discharged; and for this reason, that the contract made with the principal is then preserved, because the creditors have engaged with the principal not to sue him for a given time, but subject to the proviso that the creditors shall be at liberty to sue the surety, and so turn the surety upon the principal without any breach of the engagement with the principal. I say that this doctrine has always been recognised down to a late period, because Lord Truro threw some doubts upon it in the case of Owen v. Homan. But Lord Cranworth, in giving judgment in that case on appeal to the House of Lords (4 H. L. C. 997; 17 Jur. 861), said there could be no doubt about the case before the House, and that he did not think he should have entered into any discussion of the case had it not been for the doubt thrown by Lord Truro upon the principle that you might retain the surety, if that formed part of the original contract as to not suing the principal; and Lord Cranworth said he thought it right to protest against the doubt, because he thought the doctrine was perfectly clear and established.—p. 150. There remains one point upon which Mr. Cole pressed me very strongly. He argued that Overend, Gurney & Co. at the time when they took the bills, knew nothing of this, but believed the plaintiffs to be the principals in every sense of the word as between themselves and McH., and as between them and Overend, Gurney & Co., and he argued that their position could not be altered by their being afterwards informed of the existence of a different arrangement, and he cited an authority, Ex parte Graham. Now, in that case the lords justices asked if there was any authority to show that knowledge acquired subsequently to the engagement would fix upon the creditors the obligation of seeing to the interests of the surety: and counsel citing none, it seems to have been held that in that case the discharge did not take place. But Oakeley v. Pasheller is a precise and direct authority upon the point, and, being in the House of Lords, is of course above that of this Court or that of the lords justices.—p. 152.

COCKBURN, C.J.—It was, however, argued, that however much this might be contrary to principle, it was established by the House of Lords in Oakeley v. Pasheller. We do not think that any such point either arose or was decided in that case. The case is very imperfectly reported, and the judgment seems to have been very meagre. The case is abstracted in Lindley on Partnerships, 3rd. ed. p. 463. The decision appears to us to have proceeded on the ground that, by an arrangement to which the creditor, Sir Charles Oakeley, was a party, Kynaston, who was Sir Charles's son-in-law, became a partner in the house, which was indebted to Sir Charles, and then by arrangement between the three parties, Kynaston became a principal debtor to Sir Charles, and the outgoing partners became sureties to Kynaston. There was ample consideration for Sir Charles Oakeley agreeing to this change, and whether the conclusion of fact that he did so agree was right or wrong, the case did not and could not decide that it could be done without his consent. That such was the ground of the decision of the lords we think sufficiently appears from both reports, ill as they are reported. The facts clearly were that Kynaston made himself a new debtor to Sir Charles Oakeley; and, if he was so, the respondent could not be liable for his default except in consequence of some arrangement by which they became his sureties. In the very meagre report of the judgment of the Master of the Rolls in Bligh (10 Bligh (N.S.), p. 578), he bases his judgment on the fact that "Sir Charles Oakeley well knew, in 1817, that by the arrangement between the two partners, Reid and Kynaston, they had become the principal debtors," that is, to Sir Charles, which Kynaston could not be without Sir Charles's consent, "and Sherard's estate surety only." And during the argument in the House of Lords, Lord Lyndhurst points out the difficulty of converting a joint debtor into a surety without the creditor's assent (10 Bligh (N.S.), p. 586; and 4 Cl. & F. p. 232). He seems to have relied on this objection until the fact that Kynaston became a new debtor was brought to his notice (10 Bligh (N.S.), p. 587). And, finally, in the judgment he says, "an arrangement was made between Sir Charles Oakeley and Kynaston" (10 Bligh (N.S.), p. 589). This would have been quite irrelevant unless Kynaston had become a new debtor, and the other parties, by agreement with Sir Charles, sureties for him. It is impossible to suppose that if Lord Lyndhurst had been delivering a judgment of the House of Lords on a case of the first impression, and on which he knew (as appears from 10 Bligh (N.S.), p. 586; 4 Cl. & F. p. 232) there was no previous decision, he would have done it in so perfunctory a manner as he appears to have done. It was not right in deciding on the special facts of the particular case to give so little information to the parties, but it would have been an incredible neglect of duty to say so little. It is, however, true that in Wilson v. Lloyd (16 L. R. Eq. 60, 70; 40 L. J. Ch. 559; 28 L. T. 331; 21 W. R. 507), Bacon, V.-C., in citing Oakeley v. Pasheller, takes no notice of the very important fact that the new partner was introduced as a new member of the firm, and as a fresh debtor to the creditor by an arrangement between the three. No English case has actually decided this point if Oakeley v. Pasheller does not. But there is an Irish case cited by Mr. Wills, which should be noticed. It is that of Maingay v. Lewis. There was a plea there on equitable grounds raising this very defence. The Irish Court of Queen's Bench, on demurrer, unanimously held the plea to be bad. But, on appeal before seven judges, four reversed this decision, three being for affirming it. But it is worth while to notice the reasons on which Lawson, J. based his judgment, which turned the scale. After stating the point, he says: "To hold that this is so seems to me contrary to all sound principles of law. To affect the rights and alter the remedies, or even the order of the remedies of a creditor by an arrangement entered into between his debtors to which he was no party, seems to me to be an interference with contracts very contrary to the spirit of our law" (5 Ir. R. C. L. p. 231). So far we quite agree with him; but he adds, "I feel myself bound to come to the conclusion that the case is governed by the decision of the House of Lords in Oakeley v. Pasheller, and that I ought to follow it implicitly." Had Mr. Justice Lawson thought, as we do, that the decision in Oakeley v. Pasheller proceeded on the ground that the creditor was a party to the arrangement, he would have decided in conformity with the opinion of the dissentient three in the Irish Court of Appeal.—p. 472.

HERSCHELL, L.C., after considering the effect of Oakeley v. Pasheller and Overend, Gurney & Co. v. Oriental Financial Corporation, continued: My lords, I own I am quite unable to see any distinction, even if Oakeley v. Pasheller did not exist, between that case [Overend, Gurney & Co. v. Oriental Financial Corporation] in the House of Lords and the present. If, notwithstanding that both the debtors appeared to be principal debtors, the knowledge afterwards that one of them is a surety only disentitles the creditors to deal with the other in the way of giving time without discharging that debtor, then it seems to me that it must equally be the case—for otherwise there would be a distinction, resting on no intelligible or solid basis—that where, although both are principal debtors at the date of the contract, one of them afterwards, as between himself and his co-debtor, becomes a surety, a dealing with the one who remains the principal debtor discharges the surety.—p. 354.

CHELMSFORD, L.C.—It was contended, that in order to entitle a surety to stand in that position as to a creditor, he must show, not only that he creditor knew at the time of his contract of the relation of principal and surety existing, but also that he expressly accepted him in that relation; and various cases have been cited to support this position, and particularly what was said by Lord Campbell, in Amott v. Holden, where, after describing the surety as a person who makes himself liable for another, he adds, "If he has no interest in the transaction except as surety, and this is fully known to the creditor, who accepts him in the relation of surety, his contract with the creditor must be attended with all the incidents of suretyship" (18 Q. B. 615). In Hollier v. Eyre (9 Cl. & F. 1), nothing more than notice or knowledge by the creditor of the existence of the relation of principal and surety is stated to be necessary. It does not appear to me that there is any real difference between these two decisions. What Lord Campbell means is clearly this: if a creditor, with a knowledge that a person is intending to be surety, accepts the instrument or security which pledges his liability, the rights of suretyship attach upon the transaction; and thus explained, it is clear that in these cases knowledge and acceptance merely mean one and the same thing.—p. 500.

PALLES, C.B.—The doctrine of Phillips v. Foxall and Sanderson v. Aston . . . is now quite too firmly established to be shaken by any tribunal short of the H. L., and I hold myself entirely bound by those two decisions. Phillips v. Foxall was determined upon two different views of the law; Quain, J., who delivered the judgment of the majority of the Court, taking one view and Blackburn, J., arriving at the same conclusion upon another view. I rather think that the view taken by Blackburn, J., which was the one adopted in the Court of Exchequer in the subsequent case of Sanderson v. Aston, was the view that has since been most generally followed; but it appears to me that the ratio decidendi of both classes of judgments in Phillips v. Foxall involved this—that there should be, in the person who is suing and to whom the knowledge of the fraud, irregularity or misconduct is traced, a power of dismissal. Quain, J. specially limits his judgment to that class of case, and the judgment of Blackburn, J. is entirely founded upon it. The power of the employer to dismiss for misconduct is a power the exercise of which, when misconduct comes to his knowledge, the surety has a right to call for; and if the employer condones the misconduct in such a way as to deprive himself of the power of dismissal, he has deprived the surety of one of the rights which he, the surety, would have if he stood in the place of the employer, and therefore the surety is discharged by the ordinary rules that formerly were supposed to regulate questions arising between principal and surety in such cases. The Court of Common Pleas in this country in Lawder v. Lawder considered the effect in Phillips v. Foxall upon a bond in receipt of which the party suing was much in the same position as the Collector-General here, viz., a bond given by a county cess collector to a county treasurer. The Court of Common Pleas held—and, in my opinion rightly—that the ratio decidendi of Phillips v. Foxall and Sanderson v. Aston did not apply to such a case, because there was absent that which was the ground of the decision in both cases—the power to dismiss. I conceive that the doctrine of Lawder v. Lawder entirely applies to the case before us, that of a collector of rates appointed by the Lord Lieutenant, subject to be removed by the Lord Lieutenant only, and whose security, though nominally given to the Collector-General, is so given in pursuance of a statute which directs that that security shall be subject to the approval of the Lord Lieutenant. This is not in any sense a technical point. In my opinion upon the true construction of this Act of Parliament, the Collector-General, in respect of this security, acts in a public capacity—he is the person to whom this security is by statute to be given for the proper collection of the rates, but he has nothing to say to either the appointment or the discharge of the collectors. Upon that ground, I am of opinion that Phillips v. Foxall and Sanderson v. Aston do not apply to the present case. . . . But it was argued that there was something more in the case. The Collector-General had the power to suspend, and it was said that that power was of the same character as the power to dismiss relied upon in Phillips v. Foxall and Sanderson v. Aston, and that as he omitted to exercise that power . . . the surety is discharged. I must say I doubt very much whether that question also is not involved in the decision of the Common Pleas Division in Lawder v. Lawder. Whether, however, it be or be not, I may say for myself that, while I am prepared to follow Phillips v. Foxall and Sanderson v. Aston, and even to extend their authority so far as the reasoning on which they were founded legitimately and logically can be pressed, I am not prepared to go further. There is a broad ground of distinction between the two powers—the power of suspension and the power to discharge. The exercise of a power to discharge terminates the relationship between the employer and employed, and with it once and for ever determines the liability of the guarantee society; so in such a case, when the plaintiff fails to do that which he had the power to do, and which, he ought to have done, namely, dismissed the person employed, he in effect fails to do that which would have terminated the liability of the surety. The power of suspension, on the other hand, does not terminate the relation of employer and employed, nor does it terminate the liability.

Caxton and Arrington Union v. Dew (1899) 68 L. J. Q. B. 380; 80 L. T. 325.

BRUCE, J.—Phillips v. Foxall which was relied upon by the defendants, decided that on a continuing guarantee for the honesty of a servant, if the master discovers that the servant has been guilty of dishonesty in the course of his service, and, instead of dismissing the servant, he chooses to continue him in his employ without the knowledge or consent of the surety, express or implied, he cannot afterwards have recourse to the surety to make good any loss which may arise from the dishonesty of the servant during the subsequent service. But here there was no evidence that the plaintiffs had notice of any act of dishonesty on the part of Walter Dew in the course of his service. Walter Dew was in a position of pecuniary embarrassment, and he may have been guilty, prior to his dismissal, of acts of irregularity in delaying to pay over moneys, although that is not clearly made out; but there is nothing to show that he appropriated any money of the guardians, or failed to pay over to them when required, the money collected by him. It was only after his dismissal and after his death that it was found that he was behind in his accounts. Phillips v. Foxall is fully considered and explained in the more recent case of Durham Corporation v. Fowler (1889) 58 L. J. Q. B. 246; 22 Q. B. D. 394. There it was held that the plaintiff's acquiescence in the collector's irregular mode of accounting was not such connivance as to discharge the sureties. But, further, in the present case the plaintiffs had no power to dismiss the collector. . . . If in other respects Phillips v. Foxhall were applicable—and for the reasons I have given I think it is not—Byrne v. Muzio is an authority to show that the principle of Phillips v. Foxhall does not apply where the obligee of the bond has not the power to dismiss the collector.—pp. 382, 383.

BRETT, L.J.—When does the claim of the one surety against the other for contribution arise? It is not when he has paid only his own half of the amount for which he originally became surety, but his claim arises when he has paid more than half of the whole of the debt due to the creditor. That is the doctrine which was laid down in Davies v. Humphreys, and it was a doctrine taken from the Courts of Equity and adopted by the Courts of Law. The doctrine laid down in Davies v. Humphreys has never been questioned, and it seems to be absolutely in accordance with what Lord Eldon said in Ex parte Gifford (6 Ves. 805), upon the authority of which Davies v. Humphreys was decided. There is nothing to the contrary in the other cases which have been cited, and the doctrine of Davies v. Humphreys remains untouched, that a surety has no claim against his co-sureties until he has paid more than his share of the debt due to the principal creditor.—p. 47.

[Counsel observed: The decision of Lord Eldon in Ex parte Gifford, which is referred to by Baron Parkes in Davies v. Humphreys, was earlier in date than his decision in Craythorne v. Swinburne. There he says: "It has been long settled that if there are co-sureties by the same instrument, and the creditor calls upon either of them to pay the principal debt, or any part of it, that a surety has a right in this Court, either upon a principle of equity or upon contract, to call upon his co-surety for contribution."]

COTTON, L.J.—Does that mean while any part of the principal debt remains unsatisfied? Does it not mean when the surety has paid more than his share of the debt which remains due to the creditor?—p. 45.

DENMAN, C.J.—We thought it necessary to consider this case, because there was a ruling at nisi prius, in Bullock v. Lloyd, which seemed to be in point. But I think that cannot be supported; it is too clear that, in a case like this, no damage has arisen till the party to be indemnified is called upon to pay. The mere fault of the surety after the debt has accrued is insufficient, because that default may be amended.—p. 639.

ERLE, C.J.—In the report of Groenvelt's Case, under the name of Dr. Grenville v. The College of Physicians (12 Mod. 388), it is said, that, wherever there is a power de novo created by Parliament to fine and imprison, either of these two makes it a Court of Record, although in Dr. Bonham's Case the same principle is not affirmed; yet all that Lord Coke says there extra-judicially after deciding that the action lay has been doubted by Lord Holt in Groenvelt's Case, and attributed to the desire of Lord Coke to support a graduate of Cambridge, and to prevent what he considered an affront of the university, which must be venerated.—p. 552.

SIR B. PEACOCK (for the Court).—The Crown by virtue of its prerogative, has a right to sue by information in the name of the Attorney-General, and also has a right to sue in the Admiralty Court in the name of the Procurator-General. . . . But this right of the Crown affords no support for the proposition that the Government revenue may be reached by a suit against a public officer in his official capacity. Kirk v. Reg., which was cited by the C.J., is no authority for that proposition. . . . It seems to have been intimated that in such a suit the Secretary of State for War should be a party—that is, a party as complainant, not as defendant. Their lordships are clearly of opinion that the Deputy Commissary-General cannot be sued, either personally or in his official capacity, upon a contract entered into by him on behalf of the Commissariat Department.—p. 66.

ALDERSON, B.—Hall v. Smith goes too far: the person who selects the workmen is the party liable. Commissioners may get rid of liability by making contracts, but if they employ their own servants to do the work, they will be liable for the acts of such servants (p. 60), . . .

Hall v. Smith was rightly decided upon the facts.—p. 61.

BLACKBURN, J. [in answering the question put by their lordships to the judges].—He [i.e., Best, C.J., in Hall v. Smith] points out, clearly and forcibly, that it is harsh and impolitic to cast on individuals, acting gratuitously, a public duty, and make them responsible out of their private means for the non-fulfilment of it. But for many years it has been the practice of the Legislature to exempt the private means of commissioners from liability, either as in the present series of Acts, by incorporating them, or by enabling them to sue and be sued in the name of a clerk, and restricting the execution to the property which they hold as commissioners. The basis of Chief Justice Best's reasoning fails, and debile fundamentum fallit opus.

MANISTY, J.—As a rule, Acts for the construction of railways are permissive not obligatory: See York and North Midland Ry. v. Reg. No doubt there are exceptions, but they are of rare occurrence.—p. 256.

LORD PENZANCE.—If the matter were to be decided by previous definitions, I should prefer that of Jervis, C.J., who said, in York and North Midland Ry. v. Reg., that such words as "it shall be lawful" were to be understood as permissive only, unless some "absurdity or injustice" would follow from giving them that, their natural meaning.—p. 230.

V. WILLIAMS, L.J.—It is quite true that the principle established by York and North Midland Ry. v. Reg. that permissive powers contained in an Act of Parliament are not to be construed as compulsory unless there is something in the context or subject-matter justifying such a construction, applies as well to the maintenance of the authorised works as to their construction, as was decided in Reg. v. G. W. Ry.; but it does not follow that the grantee of a toll created by Act of Parliament can levy the toll irrespective of doing and executing the work in respect of which the toll purports by the Act of Parliament to be granted. I think that, if the grantee of the toll fails so to maintain and repair the stanch and other works as to keep the river navigable, he cannot collect the toll.—p. 839.

BOWEN, L.J.—There [Rex v. Severn and Wye Ry.] a mandamus did go to reinstate the line, Abbott, C.J. pointing out that they would not grant a mandamus to maintain it, but they would grant a mandamus to reinstate it. Upon what ground? If one looks at the 49 & 50 George III., which is not correctly transcribed in the case, one finds that there is an express obligation imposed upon the railway company to make, complete, and maintain. It is that they "shall and are hereby authorised and empowered to make, complete, and maintain the railway." Therefore the Severn and Wye Case does not prove what it is cited for; it does not prove that when a railway is once made it shall be maintained for ever. It only proves that when the statute says that they shall maintain it, there being an obligation upon them to do so, and that obligation necessarily involving an obligation to reinstate, the mandamus will go to reinstate. But here there is no obligation to maintain to be found in the statute.—p. 9.

KAY, L.J.—One of the cases before Lord Cottenham most commonly referred to is Dun (River) Navigation Co. v. North Midland Ry., in which he points out how necessary it is to interfere with a public company which is exceeding its powers to the injury of individuals, and that it is most essential to the interest of the public "that the extraordinary remedy by injunction" should exist and should be exercised in such cases. That case has been followed and treated as a leading authority on the subject from the year 1838 to the present time.—p. 310.

LORD CHELMSFORD.—Assuming that before the passing of their Act the defendants would have been liable to an action for the injury caused to the plaintiffs' house, it is necessary for the plaintiffs, in the first place, to establish that the company's Act has taken away the remedy by action, in order to open the way to their claim for compensation. If Re v. Pease (supra, col. 2643) and Vaughan v. Taff Vale Ry. were rightly decided, this question has been determined. It was established by those cases, "that when the legislature has sanctioned the use of a locomotive engine, there is no liability for any injury caused by using it, so long as every precaution is taken consistent with its use." Bramwell, B., in his answer to the questions put by your lordships to the judges, adverting to the above cases, said: "With great respect, I think those cases clearly wrong, and that they have proceeded on an inadvertent misapprehension of the object and effect of the clauses in question."—p. 201. . . . I therefore think, notwithstanding the respect to which every opinion of Bramwell, B., is entitled, that Re v. Pease and Vaughan v. Taff Vale Ry. were rightly decided.—p. 202.

BRAMWELL, L.J.—The land of the claimant was worth 6,000l. for the purposes of his business, and that has been taken from him by the company. A difficulty might have arisen from the decision in Brand v. Hammersmith Ry., but in that case no land of the plaintiff's was taken. I think that mischief has arisen from the judgments in Vaughan v. Taff Vale Ry. (supra, col. 2644) and Re v. Pease (supra, col. 2643); it would be strange if a claimant could get compensation in one case and not in another.—p. 742.

was held, in Hammersmith Ry. v. Brand, that no compensation could be recovered by an owner of land, no part of which had been actually taken, for annoyance caused through the ordinary working of a railway, although it is to be observed, full compensation for such annoyance could be recovered if any part of the land were taken—Essex v. Acton Local Board (1889) 58 L. J. Q. B. 594; 14 App. Cas. 153 (supra, col. 2648)). But no case has decided that where land, being under an express covenant that it shall not be used for a noisy business, and that covenant being for the benefit of other land, is taken by a railway company or other statutory body carrying on a business of a noisy character, the owner of the land for whose benefit the covenant is imposed, is debarred from recovering compensation for the loss and the consequent injurious affecting of his land. I think that upon principle he ought to be entitled to compensation—Fleming v. Newport Ry. (1883) 8 App. Cas. 265, and Kirby v. Harrogate School Board ([1896] 1 Ch. 437; 65 L. J. Ch. 376 (supra, col. 2648)). Where land is taken which is bound by a covenant restricting its user for the benefit of other land, the owner of that other land suffers an injury which is special and apart from that which the rest of the community are exposed to. His right is, as I have said, hardly distinguishable for this purpose from an easement, which would unquestionably, if disturbed, give a right to compensation. The presence of the restrictive covenant distinguishes such a case as this from cases of the class of Re v. Pease (supra, col. 2643), Vaughan v. Taff Vale Ry. (supra, col. 2644), and Hammersmith Ry. v. Brand, the principle of which is, in my opinion, inapplicable.—p. 78.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—How strictly railway companies are tied down when their powers are limited by reference to what is "necessary" is shown by the decisions on sect. 16 of the English Act as to the diversion of roads and rivers: See Reg. v. Wycombe Ry.; Pugh v. Golden Valley Ry. (supra). The rights of the undertakers or of the company are limited by the necessity of the case.—p. 688.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The appellants rely very much upon a line of cases, of which Reg. v. Wycombe Ry. is the best known—to the effect that a work is not "necessary" merely because it will save expense. But none of those cases turned on the particular mode of doing a thing that was necessary, but upon the question whether it was necessary to do the thing itself . . . but when once you have found, as the learned magistrate here has found as a fact, that a station is necessary, and the station is within the limits set by sect. 4 [City and South London Railway Companies Special Act, 1887], there is no authority which requires us to decide that the expense is to be disregarded, and that the County Council can say, "As there is no objection to putting your buildings behind the building line except that it will be more expensive, you must put them back."—p. 523.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The limit of deviation has reference to the line of rails, and if there are pieces of land outside the limit of deviation, but properly referred to in the book of reference and deposited plans, and if those pieces of land are bond fide wanted for the purpose of making the line within the limit of deviation, there is no authority I know of to show that such pieces of land cannot be properly taken by the railway company. There was a doubt thrown upon this point by a case which came before Stuart, V.-C., of Wrigley v. Lancashire and Yorkshire Ry., which was referred to and examined with his usual care by Hall, V.-C., in Dowling v. Pontypool, &c. Ry. The report of the judgment of Stuart, V.-C. [4 Giff. 360] runs in this way: "It is evident that no part of the field which is now in dispute as described on the deposited plans of reference constituted one close. If so, the company have no power to take the land comprised in their notice." This is not very clear; but on turning to the Jurist [9 Jur. (N.S.) 711], his meaning is intelligible enough. "It was very plain that no part of the field except that within the line of deviation was described in the deposited plans." With this explanation, which Hall, V.-C. had before him in Dowling v. Pontypool, &c. Ry., the doubt, which did exist, appears to me to disappear. That case is a clear authority, if an authority is wanted, that if you have lands properly described in the books of reference and deposited plans, and they are bond fide wanted for the purpose of making the line within the limits of deviation, the company may take them; that is common sense, and in accordance with the Act.—p. 351.

Protheroe v. Tottenham and Forest Gate Ry.

[1891] 3 Ch. 278; 65 L. T. 323.—C.A.; reversing KAY, J.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The peculiarity of this case is, that there is no indication at all upon the deposited plan of the limit of what the company want north of the line of deviation. In Dowling v. Pontypool, &c. Ry. there was a plan showing the boundary of what was wanted; but that boundary was not carried quite so far as in strictness it ought to have been. The V.-C. held that, though the boundary was not carried far enough, yet that piece was sufficiently delineated. I am not quarrelling with his inference. Whether I should have drawn the same, I do not know. Perhaps I should; but it does not follow that because he drew the inference that the piece of land in that case was sufficiently delineated, it is to be inferred that the piece of land here is sufficiently delineated. I do not think that it is delineated at all.—p. 288.

FRY, L.J.—I cannot help thinking that Hall, V.-C., in Dowling's Case, put as wide an interpretation upon the word "delineated" as it could possibly bear. Whether it is not rather wider than I should put upon it is a point upon which I need express no opinion.—p. 290.

COTTON, L.J.—The decision there [Pugh v. Golden Valley Ry.] was that the railway company, coming on a river very much winding, the course of that winding river being crossed by the railway, had no power to divert it so as entirely to take it away from one side of their railway. And on what ground? It was that sect. 16 [Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845 (8 Vict. c. 20)] must be read reddendo singulis singulis, that when in making a railway it is necessary to divert the river, then the diversion may be made; if it is necessary to cross it, then the crossing may be made, but the mode of the diversion and the mode of crossing, when it is ascertained that that is the way which is necessary for the construction of the railway, is left entirely to the discretion of the engineer. This, I understand, is the meaning of what was said by Thesiger, L.J., in giving the judgment of the Court.—p. 338.

NORTH, J.—The injunction to be granted would be to restrain the defendants from using the said road without providing a substituted road in accordance with sect. 53 [Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845], and it seems from Att.-Gen. v. G. N. Ry. that an injunction of that sort would have the effect of preventing the company running their trains over the line of railway that they have opened along the site of the original highway. Therefore, in granting an injunction I do not restrain the defendants from allowing their embankments or their rails, or whatever may be upon them, to remain where they are. I do not order those to be removed, but I must restrain the defendants from using the railway upon the site of the old road until they have substituted a proper road under sect. 53.—p. 575.

ESHER, M.R.—I think the first decision on the section [Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, s. 46], which was the decision of Campbell, C.J. and Wightman and Crompton, JJ., in North Staffordshire Ry. v. Dale, really puts the matter on the true grounds. The substance of their view is this: here is a section dealing with certain specified cases in plain language, and if that section is to be looked at alone, according to the plain meaning of the words, there could not be a doubt as to its effect: but then astute counsel suggested that it must be read in conjunction with other sections, and so endeavoured to bring a fog over its meaning. The Court said that that was not the way to construe it; that, dealing specifically with particular cases, it must be taken by itself. One thing is quite clear, that, whatever works the section compels the railway company to execute, it likewise compels them to maintain for ever. The question is, therefore, what they are bound to execute under the section? The section does not refer to all bridges which they may have to make, but only to certain bridges, which they have to make under certain specified circumstances.—p. 488.

FRY, L.J. to the same effect.

LOPES, L.J.—This is a case where a road which is a highway is carried on arches over a railway. In that case sect. 46 applies, and its language appears to me to impose on the railway company the burden of perpetually maintaining, not only the fabric of the bridge and approaches, but also the roadway over them. It seems to me idle to say that the term "bridge" does not include the roadway by which the traffic is to pass from one side to the other. The construction I put upon the section is, in my opinion, the plain meaning of the language, and there is a long current of authority in favour of that construction.—p. 490.

Ry.* was relied upon as establishing that the servants of the company alone were entitled to open gates at a level crossing, and that the same principle applied to the gates here. That case, however, related to an ordinary railway. The local legislation, with which we have to deal, enacts specific provisions and stipulations for the benefit and protection of the public; but how can new and expensive obligations, such as employing a servant to open, shut, &c., be imported into it by implication? Even if Wyatt's Case (from which Blackburn, J. dissented, and which has been questioned by Lord Coleridge) was rightly decided, it seems to me that any member of the public going by these gates was entitled to open them for the purpose of passage, and was bound to close them again after use.—p. 348.

- GIBSON, J. (for the Court).—In Matson v. Baird, a private railway, with the permission of the road authority, ran across a public highway without being fenced by gates, and it was held that the owner of the railway was not responsible for an accident thereby caused. The presence of gates is some protection, but the Court cannot enlarge that protection by imposing duties which the Legislature deemed it unnecessary to prescribe.—p. 349.

- DARLING, J.—I think that the decision in Manchester &c. Ry. v. Wallis depends upon the fact that cattle were straying, not that they were trespassers in the sense in which, in the contention upon behalf of the plaintiff, it was argued that the word "trespass" ought to be understood.—p. 712.
- CHANNELL, J.—In Manchester, &c. Ry. v. Wallis, the Court seems to have come to the conclusion (I am not sure that it decided the question, because the judgment was in favour of the railway company) that the cattle of persons who were lawfully using the highway for passing and re-passing might be considered to be cattle of the owners and occupiers of the adjoining land within the meaning of this section [s. 68 of the Railways Clauses Act, 1845]. That construction appears to me to somewhat strain the natural meaning of the words "owners and occupiers of lands adjoining," and the Court seems to have adopted it because, unless that interpretation were placed upon the words, there would be no provision in the Act, for the case of a highway adjoining a railway; and it was necessary to place a sensible meaning upon the section in the case where the adjoining land was in fact a highway. The meaning which the Court held that it bore in that case was that the cattle, which were lawfully using the highway for the purpose of passing and re-passing, were to be considered the cattle of the owners and occupiers of the adjoining land within the meaning of the section. It seems to me that that construction excludes the view that cattle which happen to belong to, or to be licensed by the individual who owns the soil over which the highway passes, could be considered to be cattle of the owners and occupiers within the meaning of the section.—p. 713.

GIBSON, J. (for the Court).—As the company were not bound by any absolute obligation to keep the gates closed, I need not consider whether the fact that the sheep were straying might not be a defence. Fawcett v. York, &c. Ry. (see supra, col. 2661), followed in Charman's Case, decides that such fact would not be an answer if an express statutory duty to keep the gates closed was violated. But, where there is no such express legislation, and the alleged breach is of an implied duty, or the action is based on negligence, different considerations may possibly arise. Whether, in such case, the reasoning in Wallis's Case, and in Luscombe v. G. W. Ry., may not apply, is a point on which I offer no opinion. Those authorities decide that a railway gate at the side of a high road is a fence within sect. 68 of the Railway Clauses Act, and that there is no obligation to maintain the gate for the protection of animals straying and trespassing on the highway.—p. 350.

POLLOCK, B.—The distinction between the duty of a carrier in the carriage of goods and in the carriage of passengers was for many years not clearly laid down in this country. In America it had been considered, and the decisions were tolerably clear. But in Readhead v. Midland Ry. the whole law was thoroughly considered, and it was shown that the contract of a railway company with a passenger is not that of an insurer, but simply to take sufficient care and to use due diligence in the provision of proper materials, engines, carriages, and the like for the carriage of the passengers.—p. 97.

LORD BLACKBURN.—In Readhead v. Midland Ry., which was the case of a contract to carry passengers upon land, there had been a good deal of reasoning in the Ex. Ch. to the effect that the obligation there was not to furnish a carriage which was absolutely perfect or landworthy, but only to furnish a carriage which was fit as far as they could reasonably make it, which is a different kind of contract from what is now supposed.—p. 86.

BRETT, J.—As to Lewis v. S. E. Ry., we should have followed it if the facts there had been the same as those here, but that case is as distinguishable from the present one as that case was from Cockle v. S. E. Ry. There it appeared that the plaintiff knew or ought to have known that the train was beyond the platform and that it was about to back. The stoppage there was not a final stand-still, and the train was in fact put back.—p. 139.

HONYMAN, J.—I do not think that the calling out the name of the station is an invitation to alight so as to be of itself evidence of negligence, but I agree with what was said by my brother Keating in Bridges v. North London Ry. (40 L. J. Q. B. 188, supra), that if the train stops afterwards it amounts to a notice that that is the place for passengers to that station to get out.—p. 139.

Ryan v. G. S. & W. Ry. (1892) 32 L. R. Ir. 15.—Q.B.D.

JOHNSON, J.—In Corry's Case the railway company made a ditch or dyke between their lands and the plaintiffs' lands, which they cleared out from time to time, but not for three years before the action. On the side of the ditch or dyke nearest the railway they planted a thorn hedge; and on the opposite side of the ditch or dyke, being that nearest to the plaintiffs' land, they set up on their own land a post-and-rail fence. In doing this they took upon themselves to define the extent of their obligation, and having done so, they neglected to maintain and keep up the post-and-rail fence. They allowed it to rot away; and the plaintiff's cow, which had been grazing in his field, fell into the ditch and was killed. The railway company neglected to maintain the ditch and post-and-rail fence which they had constructed, and were, therefore, held liable for the loss of the cow. In the present case the facts are essentially different; . . . That [Colley v. L. & N. W. Ry.] in principle is exactly the present case, for what is here alleged is, in effect, that the fence was originally constructed in such a manner as not sufficiently and effectually to separate the land taken by the railway company from the adjoining lands not taken, and prevent the cattle of the occupier of the adjoining land from straying thereout, and that it had been allowed to remain such insufficient fence.—pp. 19, 20.

ESHER, M.R.—The facts here do not in any way bring the case within sect. 73 [Railways Clauses Act, 1845], and if so, sect. 63 remains without any limitation being imposed upon it by sect. 73. Therefore sect. 68 imposes upon the defendants no limitation as to the time within which they are to make and maintain fences which will prevent the cattle of owners and occupiers of lands adjoining the railway from straying. That seems to me to be the plain construction of sect. 68, and is the same as that which has been placed upon that very section by Lush, L.J. in Corry v. G. W. Ry., and as that which has been put upon it in this case by the L.C.J., I agree that that is the right construction. The defendants were right in doing what sect. 68 enacts that they shall do—namely, in putting up this fence—but they omitted to maintain it, because they allowed it to get into a rotten condition.—p. 135.

KELLY, C.B.—There [Roberts v. G. W. Ry.] the pleader on behalf of the plaintiff had taken upon himself to allege in the declaration an absolute legal obligation upon the railway company to provide something of a specific value, namely, a fence to the station yard. But it is clear that while some protection is required in a railway station, it is impossible to say as a matter of law, without information as to the circumstances of the locality, that any specific precaution ought to have been taken so as to constitute a legal obligation upon the railway company. Upon that ground only that case appears to have been decided.—p. 86.

- STIRLING, L.J. (forself, v. WILLIAMS and ROMER, L.J.).—Now, as is pointed out by Lindley, L.J. in Rhondda and Swansea Ry. v. Talbot, it has been decided in Reg. v. Fisher and Reg. v. Brown that the "accommodation works which the company may be required to make are such accommodation works as are required at the time the land is taken having regard to its then use, and not accommodation works which may be required when the character of the land, and perhaps the nature of the neighbourhood, is entirely altered years afterwards." Further, it has been decided, first by the V.-C., and then by the C.A. in Ireland, in G. N. Ry. v. M'Alister, that the landowner having obtained accommodation works (in that case, as in this, a level crossing) suitable for his land at a time when it was used for agricultural purposes, was not entitled to use the works for the purposes of traffic in minerals quarried from the same lands. In the course of his judgment, Fitzgibbon, L.J. thus defines the rights of the landowner: "The owner of the adjoining land was entitled, when the railway was made, to a convenient passage over the railway sufficient to make good, so far as possible, any interruption which the construction of the railway caused by severance in the working of his farm, including, I should say, any alteration or extension of that working which could or ought to have been contemplated by the parties when the accommodation works were made and were accepted." With that decision and definition we agree.—p. 837.

COTTON, L.J.—That case [Att.-Gen. v. G. E. Ry.] was essentially different from the present. The G. E. Ry. there was doing something which was not strictly within the objects of its incorporation, viz., supplying and letting on hire rolling stock to another company, but as it was only supplied for a railway which could only be effectively worked in conjunction with their railway, what they did was for the purpose of providing for the traffic going over both railways, which was within their objects. The observation of James, L.J. comes only to this, that in such a case the directors have and ought to have a very large discretion as to the mode of attaining the objects of the company. Here the application of the B. capital is not for the purpose of carrying on the business, but of inducing persons to come in and subscribe the A. capital with which the company was to carry on the business.—p. 374.

BRAMWELL, L.J.—I was counsel for the plaintiff in the latter case [East Anglian Rys. v. Eastern Counties Ry.]. I know of none at common law before it in which a trace of this doctrine is to be found, and certainly, I was never more surprised than at that decision—a decision that proceeded on grounds which, with all respect be it said, were erroneous, and led, as I believe they have in other cases, to an erroneous result. The mistake was in not distinguishing that many of the provisions of Acts of Parliament constituting companies are not provisions as between the companies and the public, but agreements among the shareholders inter se which constitute their agreement of partnership, their instrument of settlement.—p. 501.

JAMES, L.J.—According to Att.-Gen. v. G. N. Ry., the Court must exercise its discretion, and the Att.-Gen. ought to exercise his discretion as to whether a sufficient case is made out for the interference of the Court. We do not mean to contend that any technical violation would do, we admit that it must be such as the Att.-Gen. in his discretion first of all, and the Court in its discretion afterwards, thinks of sufficient magnitude to warrant an injunction. —p. 472.

BAGGALLAY, L.J. (dissenting).—I am unable to distinguish this case in principle from that of Att.-Gen. v. G. N. Ry. decided by Kindersley, V.-C., eighteen years ago, and the authority of which has never, to my knowledge, been questioned. . . . The law and the practice in this respect were declared by the V.-C. in the following terms, in which I entirely agree: "Wherever the interests of the public are damaged by a company, established for any particular purpose by Act of Parliament, acting illegally and in contravention of the powers conferred upon it, I conceive it is the function and duty of the Att.-Gen. to protect the interests of the public by an information." —p. 500.

BRAMWELL, L.J.—In Att.-Gen. v. G. N. Ry. it was said that where, in the case of injury to private interests, it would be competent for an individual to apply for an injunction to restrain a company from using its powers for purposes not warranted by the Acts creating it, it is competent to the Att.-Gen., in case of injury to public interests from such a cause, to file an information for an injunction. But I ask, with sincere respect for the learned judge, what is the similarity of or analogy between the two cases, and what is the injury to public interests in such a case? How is the public injured, or any class of it? —p. 501.

MALINS, V.-C.—In Ashbury Ry. Carriage, & Co. v. Riche, the transaction was not binding on the other shareholders, because it was embarking in a totally different business. The company was constituted to build railway carriages at Birmingham, and the directors took the capital and used it in making a railway in Belgium. It was decided not only that it was not within their power, but that no acquiescence of the shareholders in what was done would bind them. But this was the act of the directors, who have only such powers as the shareholders confer on them, and they have conferred on the directors the power of conducting every kind of banking business.—p. 321.

JESSEL, M.R.—It is, moreover, a mistake to suppose that they themselves [the railway company] have the ordinary rights of proprietors in every respect to use the lands. Their rights, no doubt, are limited, though it is not necessary to state the exact limits. That point came before the Court of Q. B., in Bostock v. North Staffordshire Ry., which is not really distinguishable from the present case. It has been reported, once before Stuart, V.-C., and also before the Court of Q. B. There the majority of the Court of Q. B. were clearly of opinion, though the words there were "for the purposes of this Act and for no other purpose," which words as I said before, are implied without being expressed, that the company could not use the land except for the purposes of the Act. They had not the ordinary rights of ordinary proprietors but the Legislature empowered them to acquire and hold and use the lands merely for the special purposes of the Act.—p. 622.

LORD HALSBURY.—As to Bostock v. North Staffordshire Ry., it seems to me that the rights of the adjoining proprietor in that case were, rightly or wrongly, supposed to rest on the peculiar words of the statute.—p. 717.

LINDLEY, L.J.—If the plaintiff is well founded in his allegation that the railway company have exceeded their powers, and that he is damaged, then the authorities on which he relies entitle him to relief, although no right peculiar to him is infringed. I think Bostock v. North Staffordshire Ry. goes that length, and there are certainly cases to be found before Lord Eillon and Lord Cottenham in Chancery which sanction that purpose.—p. 719.

LORD HALSBURY.—It is admitted that in this case there is no private nuisance. So it comes back to this, that there must be some express language of the statute or some covenant implied in the statute that nothing shall be done which shall render the use of the property taken inconvenient or annoying to the adjoining property. For that proposition I think we have complete absence of authority. The only case that I remember which runs in the other direction is Norton v. L. & N. W. Ry., which was in respect of a board put up by a railway company to prevent the acquisition of light by the owner of a house near their line. Whether that case has been approved of or not, I am bound to say for myself that if the proposition to which I have referred was necessary to the decision I should entirely disagree with it, and when the matter came before the C.A. afterwards it is clear that that point never was approved of at all.—p. 717.

LINDLEY, L.J.—In that case [Norton v. L. & N. W. Ry.] Malins, V.-C. went to the length of saying that a railway company were exceeding their powers when they put up a hoarding to obstruct a neighbour's light. I must say I cannot follow that at all. It appears to me to be contrary to sound principle. It is certainly not warranted by any other decision in the books, and it is in my opinion quite inconsistent with other decisions. Although that decision of Malins, V.-C. was affirmed on appeal, it was affirmed on different grounds.—p. 721.

BYRNE, J.—Then, turning to the questions arising from the fact of one of the parties to the dispute being a railway company, I may say in the first place that in my opinion the land in question is not superfluous land, and I think that Metropolitan District Ry. and Cosh, In re (1880) 13 Ch. D. 607 [see "LANDS CLAUSES ACT," ante, col. 1555] establishes this, notwithstanding a certain doubt which was expressed by Baggallay, L.J., in that case. I think, further, it is established by Norton v. L. & N. W. Ry. (in that case, however, perhaps the opinion of the C.A. on the point was not necessary for the decision of the case), and by Bobbett v. S. E. Ry. (post), and by the observations of Lindley and A. L. Smith, L.JJ., in Marshall v. Taylor, as to the effect of Norton v. L. & N. W. Ry., that a title may be acquired by possession by a stranger to the land of a railway company even though not superfluous land, and, therefore, land which the railway company could not sell or dispose of. . . . It is true that the cases establishing the proposition I have last mentioned, having reference to railway companies, deal with land situate laterally to the companies' works, and not to land over a tunnel.—p. 415.

PEARSON, J.—In Mulliner's case what the company attempted to sell was the piece of land lying under one of the arches which supported a part of the station, and which was to all intents and purposes, therefore, a part of the works of the company which they required to keep for their own absolute use. What the M.R. decided, if I am to put it into plain and simple language, was, I think, practically this—that you could not in a case of that kind sell the floor of your house, keeping the roof only. The reason he gave in that case was that, if you wanted to repair the crown of the arch, it would be necessary to put a scaffolding under the arch, and upon this very piece of land which had been attempted to be sold. I need not say also that in that case there were other grounds for deciding as he did which would have disposed of the case without going into the question of law at all. But I cannot think that that is any precedent, or forms any principle for the present case . . . ; and to say that when a railway company have a field on one side of the boundary wall for which they have no use, and which, if they do not sell it, will vest in the adjoining landowner, they must retain so much land on the further side of their boundary wall as will lie between that wall and a line drawn vertically from the footings of the wall, would be to give a most mischievous decision.—p. 200.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—Upon the question whether the company have any power in law to grant a perpetual right of way over the piece of land they have taken, reliance was placed upon Mulliner v. Midland Ry. I do not think that that case has any application to the questions now before the Court. If the case decided that a railway company have no power to give a right of way under an archway through a railway embankment, I could not agree with it.

It seems perfectly obvious that there may be cases in which a railway company could grant a right of way of that kind, and, therefore, I think that Sir G. Jessel, M.R., never intended to lay down the law in that way.—p. 630.

RIGBY, L.J.—I conceive that the decision of Sir G. Jessel, M.R., in that case [Mulliner v. Midland Ry.] was in accordance with the law, and I am not aware that its correctness has ever been seriously disputed. No doubt attempts have been made, as in the present case, to extend the effect of the decision beyond what was intended by the M.R., and such attempts have failed. His decision was that a piece of land acquired by a railway company under their Act for the purposes of their railway, and used for the purposes of a railway-station, could not be alienated by them except under the authority of Parliament. That is undoubted law. Sir G. Jessel, M.R., then went a step further, and said that the company were not only unable to alienate the land, but were also unable to create a perpetual right of way over it. It seems to me that that is a reasonable deduction to draw from the other proposition, that the company could not alienate. That, I believe, is all that was decided in that case, and the decision, therefore, has no application to the case now before us.—p. 631.

STIRLING, L.J. (for the Court).—On the other hand, the legislature has not seen fit expressly to authorise a railway to make general grants and easements over land acquired for the purpose of its undertaking; and in *Mulliner v. Jessel, M.R., that (with some exceptions which do not affect the present question) a railway company has no right to sell, grant, or dispose of such land, or any easement or right of way over it, except for the purposes of the Companies' Act—that is, with a view to the traffic of the company; and it was there held by him that a grant of such right of way was ultra vires.—p. 837.

DENMAN, J.—Bateman v. Mid-Wales Ry. seems to me clearly to establish that a company such as this, in the absence of any provision in the memorandum or articles of association, is not empowered to bind the shareholders by accepting bills. The only case cited on the other side was Peruvian Rys. v. Thames, &c. Insurance Co. (post), but that case was decided on the ground that the words of the memorandum gave an absolute discretion to the directors to decide whether the accepting of bills of exchange was incidental or conducive to the main object of the company. In the present case no such discretion is given, and I think it clear that it would be inconsistent with Bateman v. Mid-Wales Ry. to hold that any such power is to be inferred.—p. 24.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The language of the clause in Henry v. G. N. Ry. shows, I think, tolerably plainly that what was promised to the preference shareholders there was ten per cent., and it was called interest or dividend, and the Court gave to those words the construction which they required. So with regard to Webb v. Earle—there was in that case no such context as we have here.—p. 684.

KAY, L.J.—The key of the whole decision [*Henry v. G. N. FRY, J.—There [Att.-Gen. v. Oxford, &c. Ry. (supra)], at the instance of the Att.-Gen., the Court restrained the opening of a railway not authorised by the Board of Trade. . . . Again, in Att.-Gen. v. Cokermonth Local Board, Jessel, M.R., refused to grant an injunction on the bill, because he came to the conclusion that there was no evidence of any nuisance resulting to the plaintiffs from the defendants' acts. Nevertheless, at the instance of the Att.-Gen., he granted an injunction to restrain the defendants from polluting the water of the river, because that was expressly prohibited by Act of Parliament. There, as in the present case, there was no evidence of any actual injury, but there was evidence that the defendants were doing certain illegal acts which tended in their nature to injure the public, and accordingly the injunction was granted with costs. In the more recent case of Att.-Gen. v. G. E. Ry. (supra, col. 2674), the learned L.JJ.

appear to have differed somewhat in their opinions. If they had expressed any decided view affecting the present case, I need not say that I should have followed it. But having regard to that difference of opinion, it appears to me that that case furnishes no distinct guide to me. But, when I examine the judgment of James, L.J., who was the most adverse to the rights of the Att.-Gen., I think that, even according to his view, the present action could be maintained, for, commenting on Att.-Gen. v. Cockermouth Local Board, he said (p. 483): "The board were doing works which would or might possibly poison a running stream, in direct violation of the law which prohibited them from committing a nuisance." Just as there the acts which were restrained without proof of injury were acts which in their nature tended to injure the public, so, in the present case, the acts which the Att.-Gen. sought to restrain were in their nature such as tended to injure the public. In coming, therefore, to the conclusion that this action can be maintained without proof of actual injury to the public, I think I am acting in accordance with the view of James, L.J. There is, moreover, the authority of Lord Hatherley in Att.-Gen. v. Ely, Haddenham and Sutton Ry. (1869) L. R. 4 Ch. 194; 38 L. J. Ch. 258 (supra, col. 2658). He said (p. 199): "The question is, whether what has been done has been done in accordance with the law; if not, the Att.-Gen. strictly represents the whole of the public in saying that the law shall be observed."—p. 755.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I think counsel for the defendants were well founded in saying that Sir G. Jessel was mistaken in what he there said had been decided in Att.-Gen. v. Oxford, &c. Ry. twenty years before. When the report of the latter case is looked at, it will be found that it was decided on other grounds than those on which Sir G. Jessel thought it had been decided. However, what Sir G. Jessel said in Att.-Gen. v. Cockermouth Local Board was this: ". . . 'Then this is an information by the Att.-Gen. against a public body, to enforce the terms of a public Act of Parliament. Now, if I understand the law *upon the subject, it is not necessary for the Att.-Gen. to show any injury at all. The Legislature is of opinion that certain acts will produce injury, and that is enough.' That seems to me to be directly applicable to the present case. . . . There [Att.-Gen. v. G. E. Ry. (supra, col. 2674)] the L.J. [James], dealing with the question as to certain matters being ultra vires, and as to whether, and when, the Att.-Gen. could take proceedings in such cases, said: "When a company entrusted with large powers is deliberately violating an express enactment. . . . it is really committing a misdemeanour, and ought to be at once stopped. In Att.-Gen. v. G. W. Ry. (supra, col. 2696) the railway company was prohibited by law from opening a line before it was passed by an engineer appointed by the Board of Trade, a provision intended for the safety of people's lives, and they were going to disregard that prohibition, and it is no answer for them to say that the line was so safe that no mischief could arise. The company was, of course, restrained from this violation of an express compact with the Legislature." That seems to me very apposite to the present case. . . . There [Att.-Gen. v. Shrewsbury Bridge Co.] Fry, J., commences his judgment thus: "This is clearly a case in which the defendant company without any power (for their powers had come to an end) thought fit to do certain acts which undoubtedly tended in their nature to interfere with public rights, and so tended to injure the public." This may be applied to the present case, because in the present case the defendants' sole powers of crossing the road are conditional upon their doing so at a speed not exceeding four miles an hour. . . . I refer to it [Att.-Gen. v. G. W. Ry.] because of the statement there by Wickens, V.-C.: "It is said, however, that the unsanctioned alteration is an improvement, and tends to the greater safety and advantage of the public: but, in my opinion, that is a matter with which we have nothing to do." Whether in the present case it is for the benefit of the public or not that the defendants should cross the road at a greater rate of speed than four miles an hour across a level crossing adjoining a station is a matter with which we have nothing to do.—p. 29.*

V. WILLIAMS, L.J.—Speaking for myself, I should hesitate to say that wherever a public body invested with statutory powers does something which is ultra vires by reason of its not having complied with the conditions subject to which the powers are given to it, the Att.-Gen. is entitled ex debito justitiæ to an injunction, and that the Court has no discretion in the matter. The observations of Lord Truro in Att.-Gen. v. Birmingham & Oxford Ry. (supra, col. 2696) seems to me to point against such a proposition being accurate. No such question, however, arises here.—p. 30.

CHITTY, J.—The purpose mentioned in the section [Railway Companies Act, 1867, s. 3] need not be the principal purpose for which the company is constituted; it may be an ancillary or subsidiary purpose. This point was decided by the C.A. in G. N. Ry. v. Tahourdin.—p. 582.

FRY, L.J.—Then, again, it has been said that making, working or maintaining the railway must be the primary purpose or the fundamental purpose of the company; but the statute seems to me to negative that, because it says, "either alone or in conjunction with any other purpose." And accordingly, in G. N. Ry. v. Tahourdin it was determined that a company authorised by statute to make a railway, which was merely ancillary to its purposes as a dock company, was a railway company within the meaning of the Railway Companies Act, 1867. I think, therefore, that the company in this case satisfies all the requirements of the words to which I have referred.—p. 595.

LOPES, L.J.—That case [G. N. Ry. v. Tahourdin], I think, is clearly distinguishable from the present.—p. 596.

MALINS, V.-C.—Upon the former occasion, the decision of Sir G. Turner in G. N. Ry. v. Eastern Counties Ry. was appealed to, and Mr. Pearson this morning referred to a great many other authorities—for instance, Shrewsbury, &c. v. Stour Valley Ry., which he so much relied upon, but that appears to me to be a totally distinct case. That was a case in which several railway companies had the power amongst themselves of running over a large tract of country, and the consequence of their running in opposition was to destroy each other. Thereupon they came to an arrangement that they would throw the common earnings into one purse, and divide them in certain defined proportions. There was nothing illegal in that, and the contract was decided by the Court of Queen's Bench not to be illegal. But where one company attempts to transfer all its powers, privileges, and authorities to another company, then I apprehend it does fall within the rule laid down by Sir G. Turner, which I have heard no authority to refute, and in which I entirely agree. In G. N. Ry. v. Eastern Counties Ry. there was an agreement between two railway companies, made without the authority of the legislature, whereby one of them delegated to the other all the powers which had been conferred upon it by Parliament, and it was held that it was an unlawful attempt to effect that which Parliament alone could authorise, and was against public policy, and in such a case the Court would not interfere to assist either of the parties in obtaining a collateral benefit which the agreement would give, or aid them in any manner which would promote the object of the agreement.—p. 98.

JESSEL, M.R.—It seems to me that the working, and the maintenance, and the consequent possession must be exclusive, and, therefore, that the Sevenoaks company after the completion of the line under this agreement had no right to enter at all, and had no right to interfere with the construction of any part of the works. I may mention in corroboration of the view I have taken of the working agreement two cases which seem to me to have some bearing on the matter.—p. 637. [His lordship then discussed Beman v. Rufford (supra), and Winch v. Birkenhead, &c. Ry., and continued:] It appears to me, on both those authorities, that agreements for working mean the exclusive use, and as the agreements, the subjects of those decisions, are not only similar in words, but similar in purpose, I think they are guides to me in showing that in construing this agreement I ought to arrive at the same conclusion.—p. 639.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—In Mannell v. Midland Great Western (Ireland) Ry. . . . there was an agreement to refer, and an injunction was asked for by one of the parties to restrain proceedings by arbitration, on the ground that the directors of the defendant company had been acting ultra vires. If the point had been that the agreement had been entered into by the directors on behalf of the shareholders intra vires, and they wanted to get rid of the arbitration on the ground of its being useless and futile, no injunction would have gone; but as the shareholders, who were the plaintiffs, impeached the agreement, because they alleged that the agreement was ultra vires the directors, and consequently they were not bound by it and not bound by the proceedings on arbitration, the Court granted the injunction until the proceedings in equity were taken to determine whether the agreement to refer could be successfully impeached or not. L. & S. W. Ry. v. Curd was another case which proceeded on the same principle.—p. 263.

FARWELL, J.—A great deal of argument was founded upon Caledonian Ry. v. Greenock, &c., Ry. (supra, col. 2707). It appears to me that the problem before the Court in that and subsequent cases is absolutely different from anything I have to contend with here. The question there was not whether the parties were or were not bound by the contract into which they had entered. No such question arose. The question was whether the Courts were bound or not by a substantive statutory enactment, presumably in the interests of the public, that the agreement which was confirmed between the parties should be implemented—to use the Scotch term in the Scotch case—and made effective by the two parties to it . . . The parties might waive the agreement between themselves for their own benefit. They could not, however, waive the statutory duty imposed upon them, if it be a duty imposed for the benefit of the public at large. That was the point which was considered in all the cases, and I think that what Bowen, L.J. says in L. C. & D. Ry. v. S. E. Ry. makes that abundantly clear, if it were not so otherwise . . . What the Court held in that particular case was . . . that the Court was at liberty to consider the question raised between the parties, notwithstanding the arbitration clause which had been confirmed and rendered valid by the Act of Parliament. No question arose as to whether the contract was or was not valid as between the parties themselves. The same observation applies to the other cases, especially Reg. v. Midland Ry. ((1887) 19 Q. B. D. 540, supra, col. 2707), which appears to me to be merely a question on the construction of a particular Act of Parliament, with which I really need not deal further.—pp. 855, 856.

The difficulty in carrying out the order in that case was to a great extent of a physical character, but the objection to the order was in principle much the same as in the present case.—p. 12.

THE LORD PRESIDENT.—The appellants relied upon Milner v. G. N. Ry., where compensation was refused to a barmaid who was injured by the fall of a framed sign-board in the station refreshment room at Peterborough. It appears from the report that the refreshment room was kept by the company in its own hands, and not let to third parties, as is often done, both in the case of refreshment rooms and bookstalls. Whether such places are let or not, they are in degree similar to a smithy used for shoeing the horses employed in carrying on the proper business of the company.—p. 1161.

ESHER, M.R.—The question of law which I think Collins, J., intended to decide was that the Court, in dealing with the question of through booking, is not bound by considerations of the advantage to the public, and the other considerations introduced by sect. 25 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888. He thought the decision of Mr. Commissioner Miller in the earlier case of G. W. Ry. v. Severn and Wye Ry., until it was overruled was binding upon him, and accordingly he held that as a matter of law the Court could decide a question as to through booking without having regard to the limitations and conditions which in deciding a question of through rates they are bound to take into consideration. If this was what Collins, J., held as a question of law, then I am bound to say that the decision is wrong.—p. 35.

LOPES, L.J.—I do not think that Collins, J., meant to hold that through booking must be granted as a matter of right. All he meant, I think, to decide was that slight evidence would be sufficient to justify the Court in making the order. For myself, I think that through booking can be ordered without granting a through rate. . . . I agree with what was said by Wills, J., in Sussex County Council v. L. B. & S. C. Ry.—namely, "We think that through booking, which is a small matter comparatively, but which is yet a great convenience, ought to be included amongst the reasonable facilities, but, except in one particular about to be mentioned, our order is not intended to have any further operation."—p. 35. HUDDLESTON, B.—Brown's case decided that the question of excessive charges was not a question for the Railway Commissioners, because the parties would have their remedy in the Courts. If the railway charges were excessive they could go into the County Court or the Superior Court, and recover the surplus; or if such charges were only threatened, the parties could go into the Courts and obtain an injunction.—p. 649.

COLLINS, M.R.—I was a party to that decision, as also was Sir F. Peel. . . . The decision was in favour of the applicants in that case simply and solely upon grounds which do not exist here, and was based upon very special circumstances. The Canal Company had in that case special powers authorising them to charge tolls on their railways, and had an order, made under statutory power, regulating the tolls and charges which they were to make. The Court, therefore, thought that they were in the position of persons who owned a railway in the proper sense of the term, which the public were entitled to use at certain given rates, and that that fact put them in the position of a railway company so as to bring it within the jurisdiction of the Railway Commissioners to grant them a through rate. I think that that was an extreme case decided on very special circumstances, and no such special circumstances exist here.—p. 379.

BRETT, L.J.—We are then met by the decision of the Railway Commissioners themselves. In 1875, the first case that was cited to us was heard. Strangely enough, notwithstanding the argument we have heard, on the first occasion when this question of their jurisdiction was challenged before them, they hardly entered upon the matter. They did not hear or call upon the counsel who were to support their jurisdiction, but at once, and without giving any reasons at all, determined that they had this jurisdiction. That being so in 1875, in 1878, when the second case was heard they seem to have been called upon to listen to counsel. The Lord Advocate and Mr. Kay, who I suppose did that which all counsel ought to do, insisted upon being heard. They no doubt adduced an elaborate argument before the Commissioners. Then the Commissioners decided this question, but I think their judgment contains the decision and not the reason for it. Therefore it hardly helps us.—p. 507.

COTTON, L.J.—The claim depends on sect. 23 of the Act by which the company was established, which is in the usual form, and provides for the compensation of landowners whose land has been rendered less valuable by the abandonment of the railway. I say, "by the abandonment of the railway," because although the Act uses the words "rendered less valuable by the commencement, construction, or abandonment of the railway," the appellant makes no claim except in respect of the abandonment of the railway. We had those words before us recently in Potteries, Shrewsbury and North Wales Ry., In re, in which we decided that the words "by the commencement, construction, or abandonment of the railway" were disjunctive, and the landowner's claim in this case is confined to injury from the abandonment of the railway.—p. 441.

LINDLEY, L.J.—In . . . Potteries, &c. Ry., In re, it was established that some injury was done, and we directed an inquiry as to the amount. In the present case there has been an inquiry, and the claimant fails to show that the property has been diminished in value.—p. 444.

LOPES, L.J. (who dissented on one point).—With respect to the measure of the injury, it has been laid down in Potteries, &c. Ry., In re, that it is to be determined by the value of the land immediately before and immediately after the abandonment. That is a decision by which I am bound, although it seems to me that the value of the land must be very much the same immediately before and immediately after the act of abandonment; because notice of the intention to abandon the railway must be given some time before the abandonment, and after that time there can be much change in the value of the land.—p. 445.

CHITTY, J. and C.A. COTTON, LINDLEY and LOPES, L.JJ.

COTTON, L.J.—It [Cambrian Rys. Scheme, In re] does not directly bear on the question which is now before us—the confirmation of the scheme—but it lays down usefully the principles which have to be considered on an application to confirm a scheme. In that case there was an application under sect. 7 of the [Railway Companies] Act, which provides that after the filing of the scheme it shall be lawful for the Court to stay any action, and the question there was whether the Court would, having regard to the scheme, stay the action. What Lord Cairns said was, that the scheme proposed to do that which it could not do so as to bind the creditors, and he also said that it was not a scheme on the ground of which he would stay the action of a creditor, the creditor not in any way being bound by the provisions of that scheme. Lord Cairns lays down a principle which, I think, will be useful in guiding us to a decision whether Chitty, J. was right in confirming this scheme: “Without professing to lay down any rule which is to meet every case, I cannot think it would be right that the Court should suspend the proceedings of any unpaid landowner, or, indeed, of any outside creditor, unless it saw that a scheme was proposed in good faith, which, if it reached maturity, would afford a reasonable prospect of providing for the payment of the claims of creditors, and thus compensate them for a temporary suspension of their remedies.” . . . Giffard, L.J. there [Bristol and North Somerset Ry., In re, post] referred to the case before Lord Cairns, and held that as there were provisions which directly purported to alter the position of the creditors by compelling them to give up their position as creditors and to take another and different position as shareholders, the scheme ought not to be confirmed without their assent.—p. 61.

CHITTY, J.—Sir G. Giffard, when V.-C., stated the object of the Act [Railway Companies Act, 1867] in Devon and Somerset Ry., In re, to be “to prevent a multiplicity of actions and the increase of costs, in order that railway companies might have time to see whether they could arrange with their creditors.” That, I take it, is a sufficient statement of the general object of this Act of Parliament. . . . consequently I make the same order as was made in Devon and Somerset Ry., In re, in which the V.-C. restrained execution and so forth, without the leave of the Court, but without prejudice to any application which might be made by leave.—pp. 523-4.

LORD WATSON (for the Court).—The appellants relied upon the authority of Gardner v. L. C. & D. Ry. and Bishop's Waltham Ry., In re (1866) L. R. 2 Ch. 382; 15 W. R. 96). These cases, which were decided by Earl Cairns (then L.J.)

and Turner, L.J., establish conclusively that, in England, the undertaking of a railway company, duly sanctioned by the legislature, is a going concern, which cannot be broken up or annihilated by the mortgagees or other creditors of the company. The rule thus settled appears to rest upon these considerations,—that, inasmuch as Parliament has made no provision for the transfer of its statutory powers, privileges, duties, and obligations from a railway corporation to any other person, whether individual or corporate, it would be contrary to the policy of the legislature, as disclosed in the general railway statutes, and in the special Acts incorporating railway companies, to permit creditors of any class to issue execution which would have the effect of destroying the undertaking or of preventing its completion.—p. 474.

V. WILLIAMS, L.J.—The observation of Lord Cairns (then Cairns, L.J.) in Gardner v. L. C. & D. Ry., seems plainly to apply: "It cannot, in my opinion, be doubted but that the company, owing a sum to their contractors for works done, might have paid this sum out of those surplus sale moneys (the claim of debenture-holders being out of the way); and, if so, they might equally, as I think, have given the contractors a charge upon the sale-moneys for the amount." It is true that this observation deals only with proceeds of the sale of surplus lands, and not with surplus lands themselves, but the security given was a charge upon the surplus lands and the rents and proceeds of the sale of such lands, and the principle involved in the observation does not seem to be affected by being applied to the proceeds. I do not gather that Lord Cairns meant to exclude surplus lands, at all events in any case where such lands were extendible by devisit, and could thus be commensurably applied to the satisfaction of the creditors' debt. This principle is recognised in Blackmore v. Yates (1867) 36 L. J. Ex. 121; L. R. 2 Ex. 225; 16 L. T. 288; 15 W. R. 750.—EX., where a railway company conveyed to a creditor (before the Act for the protection of rolling-stock) their rolling stock as security. I do not think that one ought to read the observations of Martin, B., declining to determine what the shareholders or the Att.-Gen. might do to prevent the charge being given, as really affecting the principle. It is a remark made ex abundanti cautela.—p. 181.

RIGBY, L.J.—But it has been argued that though the two clauses of sect. 4 [Railway Companies Act, 1867]—the first which restricts the right of execution, and the second beginning with the word "but," which introduces the power to appoint a receiver—are parts of one section, yet the two parts are quite independent of each other, and should be treated as if they were two sections, and the judgment of Sir G. Jessel, M.R., is cited as an authority that they ought to be treated as two sections. I entirely dissent from that. No Court can by its finding alter facts. No Court by its finding can say that there are two sections and not one. But in my opinion the judgment which is relied on in Manchester and Milford Ry., In re, has no such effect as has been attributed to it. No doubt in that case Sir G. Jessel, M.R., speaks of the new right conferred by the second part of the section as "wholly independent of the fact that the railway company had or had not rolling-stock to be taken in execution," and as "an entirely new right given to all judgment creditors of railway companies"; but we must consider what the facts in that case were. The line there had been opened for public traffic, and the Court was asked to appoint a manager of the undertaking. The appointment was apparently objected to on the ground that the petitioning creditor was not deprived of any right by the first part of sect. 4; and the Court said that the second part of the section applied notwithstanding that the company had no rolling stock to be taken in execution; but no one, I think, would have been more astonished than the learned judges who decided that case if they had been told that their language was to be wrested out of its meaning, out of the context in which it occurs, and out of the facts to which it was applied, to mean that the two branches of the section could be treated as two sections having no relation to one another. All that the learned judges meant to say, I think, was this—that it was not necessary for a creditor to show that he had been deprived of a special or particular right by the first part of the section before he could have the benefit of the new general right which is conferred by the second part. That, in my opinion, is all the Court meant to lay down in that case.—p. 465.

COTTON, L.J.—I said in a former case, Mersey

Ry., In re, that this section [Railway Companies Act, 1867, s. 4] deprives those who obtain judgments on certain contracts, and under certain circumstances, of the right they would otherwise have of taking the rolling stock in execution, and gives them a remedy against something quite different from that which they could have taken in execution, by enabling all the revenues of the company to be brought in and applied in payment of the judgment creditors, and possibly of all creditors. What is there to require the Court to restrict the receiver to the mere railway undertaking?—p. 592.

FARWELL, J.—As expressed by Kay, J. in Eastern and Midlands Ry., In re, and explained, and perhaps a little varied, by the C.A. in Wrexham, Mold and Connah's Quay Ry. (No. 2), In re, the section [Railway Companies Act, 1867, s. 4] points to all expenses or outgoings, which may be called a sine qua non to the continued existence of the undertaking as a going concern. In the latter case the C.A. did not altogether approve of the way in which it was put by Kay, J. in Eastern and Midlands Ry., In re, if he intended—and I am not sure that he did intend—to say that “proper outgoings” added nothing to “working expenses.” I do not think that is what he meant. It is obvious that “working expenses” are one thing, and “other proper outgoings” are another thing. The question before the C.A. was one relating to the costs of the receiver and manager in defending certain proceedings in respect of a very large claim which they defended under the direction of the Court, and the Court thought that those costs might be allowed, although they held that they were neither working expenses nor proper outgoings. That case, however, does not really affect the point before me. The principle which has been laid down by the Courts is summed up shortly by Chatterton, V.-C. in Naran and Kingscourt Ry., In re, as follows: “The Act plainly intended that expenses, such as common sense will show to have been for the working of the railway and for the outgoings necessary to enable it to do its service to the public efficiently, should be paid in the first place, and all the surplus applied to payment of all the debts of the company, properly so called, according to their respective rights and priorities, to be ascertained by the Court.”—p. 672.

BOVILL, C.J. (during the argument).—Our decision in that case (Ainsworth v. Malcolmson, 15 Ir. L. R. 375), it was considered that it ought to be made before the holding of the revising sessions; but I agree that the reasons which we gave for our decision . . . are directly opposed to those in the Irish cases, unless there be any material difference between the English and Irish Acts.—p. 181.

HUDDLESTON, B.—London Union v. Acocks (supra) is clearly distinguishable from Saul v. Wigan Sanitary Authority, for in the latter the rate was made for sanitary purposes, and was not in any way connected with the relief of the poor. In the present case the same question arises as in London Union v. Acocks, namely whether a retrospective rate may be made for purposes connected with the relief of the poor. I am of opinion [that it can and] that the justices were wrong.

Barton v. Birmingham Town Clerk (1878) 48 L. J. C. P. 87; 39 L. T. 352.—C.P.

COLERIDGE, C.J.—It has been said that this decision must conflict with the case of Cross v. Alsop, but, in the first place, the facts in that case are not the facts in this case. So far from the complainant's name in that case having been omitted, it had been inserted, and wrongly inserted; and the argument in the case raised the point distinctly. On those facts, argued upon this footing, the judges in Cross v. Alsop say that when the complainant has lost his vote, partly in consequence of its having been improperly claimed, the case is not within the statute, his name not having been omitted from the rate-book, but inserted in a wrong manner. The judges do, no doubt, go on—and it was necessary for them to go on, in order to show that the proviso in sect. 19 did not apply to the case before them—to deal with the only two questions raised by the facts. There was no order of the vestry, and no agreement between the owner and the overseers; and they say that the complainant is not therefore aided by sect. 19—first, because his name was not omitted from the rate book, and, secondly, because the owner had not been made liable to the payment of rates in either of these two ways. It was not suggested that this third mode of liability existed in that case. But in this case the facts raised a question which was not before the Court then, and was not decided by the judges at all. We are not, therefore, conflicting with the decision of this Court in that case, though, no doubt, expressions may be found in the judgments which appear to limit the operation of sect. 19. I do not, however, think that those expressions are to be taken in their full sense, especially as sects. 7 and 8 were not brought before the notice of the Court. But there is a case which is directly in point—the case of Smith v. Seghill.

ESHER, M.R.—But the occupiers did not give up the occupation of the mill [during the strike]; they occupied with some servants who were keeping the machinery in order. Then it is said that the overseers, who admittedly cannot alter the amount of the rate, are to say, "This mill was being used as a warehouse [for storing machinery] during the time [of the strike]"— which was not the fact—and upon that they are to make an allowance or deduction from the rate to be collected. There is no authority for such a proposition as that. The case which has been cited has nothing to do with the facts of this case.

BRETT, L.J.—That case is not an authority which is binding upon us, because in the Exchequer Chamber, which was a Court of co-ordinate jurisdiction with ourselves, the judges were equally divided, and, therefore, the judgment of the Queen's Bench stood affirmed.—p. 328.

I reserve until a proper occasion my opinion whether London & North-Western Railway Co. v. Buckmaster was correctly decided.—p. 331.

[Note.—In the report of this case in the Law Journal (52 L. J. M. C.), Brett, L.J., is reported to say, "If it were necessary I should desire to say that I reserve my opinion on the case of The Electric Telegraph Co. v. Overseers of Salford."

WILLS, J. (for the Court).—It may be conceded on the authority of L. & N. W. Ry. v. Buckmaster that if one entire assessment be made in terms upon property which he does occupy, and upon other property which he does not occupy, so that upon the true state of facts being ascertained, it is impossible to satisfy the description in the rate book without including property which he does not occupy, the rate will be bad and ought not to be enforced. This is, however, a very different case from the present one, in which the property actually occupied by the persons rated, fulfils the description appearing upon the rate book.

CAVE, J.—I think, too, that Reg. v. Fange is distinguishable. It is quite true that in that case the rate was imposed by an Act of Parliament, but the Act appears to have been passed in accordance with an original agreement. Here the real point is that the rate is paid for the preservation of the salmon, which is better accomplished by concerted action under an Act of Parliament than by leaving each owner to protect his own property. . . . I think the learned recorder was wrong, and that the rate is an expense deductible within the meaning of 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 96.

LORD HERSCHELL.—Having given my reasons for thinking that the judgment of the C. A. in the Burton-on-Trent Case was correct, and that the principles there laid down are in accordance with the law, I turn now to the point which it was thought differentiated the St. George's Case [one of the cases under appeal] from the Burton-on-Trent Case—namely that neither the M.B.W. nor the L.C.C. could under the statutes which gave them their powers, have become tenants of the pumping stations of which they were and are the owners. The point was first glanced at in the judgment of the M.R. in Reg. v. London School Board (see supra). "If," said the learned judge, "by the terms of any statute, it" (the school board) "could not legally be tenant, it would be excluded from the calculation." The view thus suggested was adopted by the C. A. as the ground of their decision in Owen's College v. Chorlton-upon-Medlock. . . . I have stated fully the reasons which led the learned judges to the conclusion that the governors of Owen's College were to be left out of account as possible tenants when determining the annual value of the premises occupied by them, and I have most carefully considered these reasons with all the respect which is justly due to the views of the learned judges who concurred in them; but I am unable to share the opinion which they expressed. The conclusion arrived at is in its result sufficiently startling. Two public bodies might have erected buildings similar in all respects upon lands similar in situation and of equal value; and these buildings might be occupied in the same way and applied to the same purposes; and yet, if one of these bodies had power, under the statute constituting it, to hire such buildings, and the other had no such power, the rateable value of the buildings might, and almost certainly would, be different—that is to say, the buildings would have a different annual value, for the words in the statute of Will. 4 which follow the expression “annual value” only provide a means of arriving at what is the annual value of the premises. Why should the annual or the rateable value of the premises for the purposes of the poor law depend upon the statutory power of the owner to take them, supposing he had not been the owner? I am unable to discover any satisfactory reason for this difference, and none seems to me to be suggested by the judgments in the Owen's College Case. I do not think the distinction drawn can be confined to premises belonging to and occupied by public bodies for public purposes. A private individual might receive money under an obligation to erect with it a building upon a particular site to be occupied by him during his lifetime, and with a prohibition against letting to anyone else. If the principle adopted in the Owen's College Case be a sound one, such an owner would, I presume, be equally excluded from consideration. No attempt was made to show that it was reasonable or just that the distinction drawn in that case should affect the rateability of premises or their assessment to the poor rate: it appears to have been thought a necessary consequence of the application to such a case of the rule for the assessment of property laid down by the statute of Will. 4. No doubt if this were so the conclusion reached was a right one, however unsatisfactory or even unjust it might be, that the rateability or assessment of premises in other respects similar, and occupied for similar purposes, should depend upon whether the owner could have taken the premises which he occupied as tenant, or was only enabled to become the owner of them. But having regard to the language used in the statute, and the construction which has been put upon it, I do not myself feel the difficulty by which the C. A. seem to have been pressed. An owner who is in occupation of premises can, of course, never reasonably be expected to take them as tenant from year to year—he cannot become tenant to himself. Yet it has been held that the rent which, if the property were in other hands, he would be willing to pay, may be taken into account when enquiring what is its annual value; that is, at what sum it might reasonably be expected to let from year to year. If the hypothesis be admissible that the owner might himself be amongst the possible tenants—although, as a matter of fact, he could not be so—it seems to me no more violent hypothesis to conceive him as amongst the possible tenants, even although he may be subject to certain legal restrictions which would prevent him becoming so. And, having regard to the scope and object of the enactment in the statute of Will. 1, I can see no sufficient reason why, if in the one case he may be regarded as the hypothetical tenant, he may not equally be so regarded in the other.—pp. 24, 25, 26.

HERSCHELL, L.C.—The Erith Case and all the cases there dealt with were cases of a totally different character. They were cases in which the argument had been used, that, inasmuch as the particular occupier, who was the only person who would give anything considerable for the land, could not make any profit out of it, from the very nature of the circumstances under which the hereditament was employed, therefore, either it had no rateable value, or in estimating its rateable value you were bound to regard the actual tenant as not being within the category of hypothetical tenants. That was the question raised there; and all that was said about profits and about land being “struck with sterility” by the statute and so on, was said in relation to a case of that description, where the argument was either that the land was not rateable or that you were to exclude from amongst the possible tenants the actual tenant. I took care to guard myself, as I thought, in the opinion which I delivered against being supposed to deal with the class of cases now before your lordships, because I said: “There is no doubt a certain class of cases in which the amount of profit which can be earned by the occupation of a hereditament is very material in ascertaining the sum at which it should be assessed. In the case of gasworks, waterworks, and other industrial undertakings where a hereditament is enhanced in value by its connection with a profit-earning undertaking, the profits earned and the shares of those profits attributable to any particular hereditament have to be taken into account, and in such cases as these” (that is wherever profits have to be taken into account) “any restrictions which the law has imposed upon the profit-earning capacity of the undertaking must, of course, be considered.” The present case, I agree with Lord Halsbury in thinking, comes exactly within the class of cases which I had in view when I used those words, in which I expressly said that, in my opinion, any restrictions put by the legislature on the profit-earning capacity of the undertaking were to be taken into account. Now the present is just one of those cases. . . . In the Erith Case I pointed out that where you came to the conclusion that the actual owner or occupier would pay a higher rent than anybody else was likely to pay, even there, taking the occupier into account in considering what a hypothetical tenant would give, you were not to fix the amount higher than you thought that tenant would pay.—pp. 54, 55.

LORD HERSCHELL.—In my opinion the Erith Case has no application. The land on which the pumping-stations were constructed, the rateability of which was there in question, was not by statute dedicated to that use. . . . About the rateability of the land there could be no real controversy. . . . Here these very lands and every part thereof, by statute must be held in perpetuity for the use of the public, and the question is, whether, under these circumstances, they are rateable at all. I think that on principle they are not.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The only case that seems to me to present any difficulties is Chidley v. West Ham. But I think that the true view of that case is that it was decided on the ground that the tanks in question had been rated as mere personal property. I do not understand the case as deciding that they could not have been taken into account at all in fixing the rateable value of the premises. It would have been absurd to suppose on the facts stated that they would not have passed by a demise of the premises.

COLLINS, M.R.—That was a rating case. It was commented upon by the C.A. in *Tyne Boiler Works Co. v. FIELD, J.—The appellant proposed to show that by reason of the price of provisions, &c. it was impossible to carry on business at a profit. It was put thus: "I buy as cheap and sell as dear as I can, but I cannot afford a higher rent than 400l." Now is evidence of this kind admissible? In Reg. v. Verrall (infra) the very point was raised and evidence of the profits derived from the use of certain land as a race-course was held admissible, not as an absolute test, but as a material element in determining the value of such land. That was the converse of the present case, but the same principle applies. It seems to me that Reg. v. Verrall in no way conflicts with the decision in Reg. v. North Aylesford, where all that was held was that evidence of a particular mode of carrying on business was inadmissible to show the value of the premises.—p. 34.

BOWEN, L.J.—I think an interpretation can easily be placed on the language used in that case to prevent our being driven to the supposition that it was intended that, should the houses happen to be unoccupied during the last part of the last rate before the company took them, thereupon the company are to escape all liability under this section [sect. 133 of the Lands Clauses Act, 1845] in respect of these houses.

KEATING, J. (in answering the question of their lordships):—All that was held there was that the occupation by the visitors in Hampton Court Palace was whilst it continued beneficial, within the statute of Elizabeth, so long as the sovereign did not actually reside; and the ground was stated by Lord Denman to be, that if the owner of premises goes abroad, permitting a friend to occupy under the superintendence of the domestics of the house during his absence, the friend and not the owner would be rateable. A strong proposition undoubtedly, but not touching the present case.—p. 121.

COLERIDGE, C.J.—It is most important that in rating cases, where a line has been drawn by competent authority which is plain and intelligible to the persons who have to exercise the duties of rating, and which has been assented to in a variety of cases, we should adhere to some such line, unless we see some very good reason for differing from it. Now, it appears to me that such a line has been drawn plainly, and so that overseers can clearly act upon it, in Gambier v. Overseers of Lydford. That case has decided, that where there are public buildings—like a prison, station-house, or buildings of that description—all occupied together, not by any individual personally, but by some public body as representing the Crown, who hold the whole as the Crown's building, or for the purpose of the government of the country, the Court will not look at whether this or that particular or set of rooms, is or is not occupied, so as to give a benefit to the persons who occupy, but if such room or rooms form an integral part of a whole which in itself is not rateable, the persons who so occupy are not rateable.—p. 150.

BOWEN, L.J.—The observation I have to make with regard to Reg. v. St. Martin's, Leicester, is very short—if that case is inconsistent with Gambier v. Lydford Overseers (supra); then it was wrongly decided—but if it is not inconsistent, then it does not affect the present case.—p. 70.

ESHER, M.R.—The rule which governs the present case is that laid down by Lord Cairns in Greig v. Edinburgh University (infra, col. 2753). . . . He states the rule thus, "The Crown not being named in the English or Scotch statutes on the subject of assessment, and not being bound by statute when not expressly named, any property which is in the occupation of the Crown, or of persons using it exclusively in and for the service of the Crown, is not rateable to the relief of the poor." In the case before us the premises were not used exclusively for the service of the Crown, and so do not come within the exemption, and are therefore rateable. It is said that the decision in Nicholson v. Holborn Union is opposed to this view. I do not think it necessary at present to determine whether that is the case; but if it is that decision must be taken as overruled.

WESTBURY, L.C.—After considering the above case and the other cases mentioned below, continued: At last in Tyne Commissioners v. Chilton the Court of Queen's Bench recurred to that which is, in my opinion, the true principle, namely, that the only ground of exemption from the statute of Elizabeth is that which is furnished by the rule that the Sovereign is not bound by that statute; and that consequently when valuable property (that is, property capable of yielding a net rent above what is required for its maintenance), is sought to be exempted on the ground that it is occupied by bare trustees for public purposes, the public purposes must be such as are required and created by the government of the country, and are therefore to be deemed part of the use and service of the Crown.—p. 24.

CROMPTON, J.—The decision in this case, I believe, created as much surprise as any decision in Westminster Hall, but the principle of which was adopted generally by the Courts. However, we considered that case and all the other cases upon the point (as to the liability of public property to poor rates) in Birkenhead Dock Trustees v. Birkenhead Overseers (2 El. & Bl. 148), and we gave judgment there upon the ground that the purposes of the occupation, though public to some extent, were purposes which benefited only a section of the public. I had some difficulty at the time in distinguishing an occupation producing a benefit to only one section of the public, as in Reg. v. Liverpool; a benefit to one particular town; however, I think, that we laid down the proper rule.—p. 526.

Jones v. Mersey Docks, explained and limited.

Reg. v. St. Martin's, Leicester (1867) L. R. 2 Q. B. 493; 36 L. J. M. C. 99; 8 B. & S. 536; 16 L. T. 625; 15 W. R. 1096.—Q.B.

MELLOR, J.—On reading the Mersey Docks Cases, one cannot fail to see that, although the decision did produce a great revolution in the subject of rating, yet the time had arrived finally to decide between conflicting principles, for the cases as to the exemption from rateability of buildings occupied for public purposes had been so eaten away by the decisions in the time of Lord Campbell, that it required only a touch to destroy them, and this was done in the House of Lords by tracing the exemption to its true foundation, viz. the maxim that the Crown was not bound, not being named in the statute 43 Eliz. c. 2 . . . When you look at this classification of cases [i.e., the classification given by Lord Cranworth in Jones v. Mersey Docks] it clearly was not intended to affect such cases as profess to be decided on the ground that in effect the Crown was in occupation by public servants carrying out the purposes of the government of the country. The Queen is the fountain of justice to all the subjects of the realm, and buildings which are necessarily occupied for the purposes of administering justice, and for cognate objects are within the exception as buildings really occupied for the discharge of duties arising out of the prerogatives of the Crown. In the present case the purposes of the occupation are so bound up with the administration of justice, that I think we cannot distinguish the present from cases which were not intended to be affected by the opinion of the judges delivered in the Mersey Docks Cases, nor, as it appears to me, by the judgment of the House of Lords.—p. 500.

BLACKBURN, J.—It is on this principle (the exemption from rate of property occupied by or for the Crown) that a servant of the Crown who had taken a lease of premises to be used as barracks, as in Lord Anherst v. Lord Summers (2 T. R. 372), was held not liable to be rated; and this principle extends to the case of a person in occupation of premises, whether as servant or trustee for the Crown, and so far from being overruled in the case of Mersey Docks, this principle was affirmed.—p. 146.

MELLOR, J.—It is said that the only exemption that could be contended for was that created by the decisions which had been overruled by Jones v. Mersey Docks, and that when those cases fell the exemption fell with them; but that is not so; the legislature chose to alter what was then supposed to be law as to corporate property in general, and expressly provided also that certain property should be exempt.—p. 477.

SIR M. E. SMITH (for the Court) says of the above case that it determined in effect that except in the case of the Crown, a liability to be rated attached upon every occupation from which benefit is derived, although the occupation was for purposes which might be deemed to be of a public nature.—p. 104.

BRETT, L.J.—Then it is said that this case resembles Jones v. Mersey Docks. The question is whether it resembles most that case or the cases of the main sewers of the M. B. W., which are not liable to be assessed to the rates, and I think that the resemblance is to these latter cases. I am of opinion that, both on the ground that there is no occupation of the bridge by the Metropolitan Board, and no beneficial occupation, the Metropolitan Board are not liable to be rated in respect of this bridge.—p. 85.

LORD DAVEY.—In that case, although it is quite true that the question which was put to the learned judges by the House, and the question which was decided, was whether the hereditament was rateable at all, yet in answering that question, ex necessitate the consideration of the question was involved upon what basis the rating should be. The argument used was that there was no beneficial occupation, and it was held to be rateable because there was a beneficial occupation. I conceive that in principle, and impliedly (as I think has been held in subsequent cases which have come before the Courts), what was really decided was that notwithstanding the restriction upon the application of the profits resulting from carrying on that business on the hereditament, the profits so derived were a legitimate element in arriving at the value of the beneficial occupation which was to be the subject of rating.

ESHER, M.R.—Now the question of whether the occupying tenant could be taken into consideration as a possible hypothetical tenant was never raised for decision till Reg. v. London School Board [supra, col. 2737]. It is said the point might have been raised for decision in M. B. W. v. West Ham, but even if it had been put before the Court, there was this peculiarity in the case, that it had been left to the Court to draw inferences of fact, and the Court, by the inference they drew, shut themselves out from deciding the point, because the inference they drew was that the sewer was incapable of beneficial occupation. That is a finding which is contrary to what is found in this case.

ESHER, M.R.—Sheppard v. Bradford has been cited, in which it was held that a reformatory school substantially similar to that now in question was not rateable. This case was decided before the Mersey Docks Case (supra, col. 2750) and there does not appear to have been any long series of cases on the subject in which that decision was acted on, or any continued course of practice founded on the decision which has been recognised or uncontested for a long period. It seems to me, therefore, that Sheppard v. Bradford must be considered as overruled by the Mersey Docks Case unless the buildings there in question could be brought within the strict rule laid down by the H. L. In Reg. v. West Derby Lord Blackburn seems to have treated it as overruled.—p. 455.

LORD HERSCHELL.—This judgment [the judgment in the above case] appears to me to lose sight of the fact that what has to be construed is the combination "voluntary contributions," and not merely the word "voluntary" alone, or in some other combination. It may be that this word is ordinarily used as the antithesis to "compulsory," though in legal parlance it is quite commonly employed to describe that which is gratuitous and without consideration. But putting aside this legal acceptance of the word, I cannot think that "voluntary contributions" in the Statute means the same thing as "voluntary payments," or that an institution can properly be said to be supported by voluntary contributions where these are the price paid for a purchase, whether of goods or advantages, merely because the person making the payment was under no obligation to do so.

MELLOR, J.—It is true that Cockburn, C.J., in Reg. v. Glamorganshire Canal, seems to have disapproved of the decision of Lord Campbell, C.J., and Erle, J., in Reg. v. Grand Junction Canal; but I think that there is a distinction between the two cases. I do not think that Lord Campbell, C.J., and Erle, J., intended to say that the land occupied by the canal was always to be rated at the value of purely agricultural land, which Cockburn, C.J., in Reg. v. Glamorganshire Canal, appears to have thought they intended, but at the increased value of surrounding land as determined from time to time by circumstances. If the land lying near becomes of more value by a new mode of cultivation being adopted, or by a different use being made of it, as being used as a market garden, or by buildings being erected in the neighbourhood, then the rateable value of the canal will be determined by the increased rateable value of the land lying near.—p. 178.

BLACKBURN, J.—Now, it has been argued that we are not bound by the Neath Case, for this reason, it is said it is in conflict with the West Ham Case, and if it is in conflict we have to decide which of the two we will follow. I think it may very well not be in conflict with the West Ham Case, because I think that the West Ham Case may be considered as supported on one of the two grounds which I have referred to. But, supposing that was not so, supposing that we had overruled the West Ham Case, we have now to consider which of the two is the best decision; and so looking at it for the reasons I have already intimated, I think, not only is the Neath Case the last, but also it is the best. I cannot come to the conclusion that, in considering sect. 33 of the Lighting and Watching Act we can say that, in the words, "houses, buildings, and property other than land," and "land," the antithesis is between land in its natural state, or in an agricultural state, and land in which any money has been invested for commercial purposes: I think the distinction is between land, which is the general word, and land which has been built upon. Such property is either a house or building, or something which for any reason is not a building—a house or things ejusdem generis; and I think neither a railway nor a canal could be considered as a building in that sense. For that reason I think we should follow the Neath Case, both as being the last and as being, in fact, the best decision of the two; and the result is that the order of the sessions must be amended by reducing the rate.

CAIRNS, L.C.—That case turns entirely upon this, that the owner of the hulk, who was the person rated, was not in occupation of these moorings. The moorings were not his—the moorings were the moorings of the conservators. . . . CAVE, J.—In that case certain dues were given to the dock company in respect of the charges and expenses they had been at in making the docks, and these dues were of the same amount, and were equally payable whether the ships entered the docks, the property of the company, or merely entered the harbour, which was not the property of the company, without going into the docks at all. The docks were the sole meritorious cause of the company's right to the dues, and it was held that the dues were not the less earned by the docks where the ship actually entered the docks, because the ship must have paid the same amount if it had not entered the docks at all. In the present case the wet dock is not the sole meritorious cause of the commissioners' right to the dues. On the contrary, the commissioners have executed and maintain works in the harbour by which ships using the harbour are directly benefited, and seeing that all ships entering the harbour pay a certain and uniform rate whether they enter the wet dock or not, while those which enter the wet dock pay an additional rate of 2*d.* a ton, from which those who do not enter it are free, and seeing that the former rate was always payable even before the wet dock was made, while the additional rate only came into operation when the wet dock was completed, the inference is, in my judgment, irresistible that the additional 2*d.* a ton alone is earned by the wet dock, and that the dues which all vessels pay alike, whether they enter the wet dock or not, are earned by the works carried out and maintained by the commissioners in the harbour, and cannot be taken into account in rating the docks, because they are not earned by the wet dock, nor is the wet dock in any way the meritorious cause of them.—p. 86.

COCKBURN, C.J.—The Hull Dock Case undoubtedly establishes this—that where there is a series of docks all lying contiguous to one another, and forming part of one entire concern, and toll is taken for the right to enter into and have the benefit of any of that series or general system of docks and dock accommodation, you cannot apply the parochial principle of rating, but must have recourse to the acreage principle. But the language of all the judges in that case. I think, goes entirely to this, that you are not to resort to the acreage principle, except, ex necessitate, where you really cannot apply the other. If this case were on all fours with the Hull Dock Case, I do not know—as it has stood for eighteen years—that it would be right to overrule it; certainly not without further consideration. But this case appears to me to be plainly distinguishable, as the docks on the one side and the other of the Mersey do not appear to me to come within the designation of one series or system of docks.—p. 649.

Sculcoates Union v. Hull Docks Co. (1894) 64 L. J. M. C. 49; [1895] A. C. 136; 11 R. 74; 71 L. T. 642; 43 W. R. 623; 59 J. P. 612.—H.L. (E.).

LORD HERSCHELL.—It seems to me, therefore, that theoretically the method contended for by the appellants is the wrong one. I quite feel the force of the arguments they have addressed to your lordships—very able arguments—with a view to showing that, although it may not be theoretically accurate, it is the best practical measure of the value of a dock in a particular parish. That was the conclusion arrived at by the Court of Queen's Bench in Reg. v. Hull Dock Co.; but there all the learned judges admitted that it was not the plan which ought to be adopted if you were able to ascertain what were the earnings of the docks in the particular parishes; that you only resorted to it from necessity, because it was not possible to ascertain the earnings of the particular docks, and so arrive at the rateable value. At a later date, The Mersey Docks v. Liverpool (supra) came before the Courts; and the Court of Q. B.—differently constituted, no doubt, from the Court which decided The Hull Dock Case—held that the method which had been sanctioned in The Hull Dock Case was not to be applied in the case of the Liverpool and Birkenhead docks. The learned judges there came to the conclusion that the method which the Q. B. had pronounced theoretically incorrect, but only practically employed because it was impossible otherwise to arrive at the rateable value, was a wrong one; and they considered that there was no real difficulty in arriving substantially at the true result by looking to see what proportion of the dock earnings was attributable to a particular part of their dock system, dependent as that would be upon the amount of traffic which went to one set of docks as compared with another. In The Hull Case, Lord Campbell, in the course of the argument, suggested that the question would have been the same if the docks had not been altogether on the Humber, but had been, some on the Humber and some on the Tyne. That was the very question, or the sort of question, which had to be considered in The Mersey Docks Case, except that the docks were on the same river; but the river there was a mile broad. But between The Mersey Docks Case and the case now before your lordships, I am unable to see the slightest distinction. If we decide this case as the appellants ask us to do, we inevitably overrule The Mersey Docks Case. I am not prepared to do so, I think the decision in The Mersey Docks Case was right, and I am quite ready myself to adhere to it in all respects.—pp. 51, 52.

HERSCHELL, L.C.—Now if land is “struck with sterility in any and everybody’s hands” (the phrase used in the above case), whether by law or by its inherent condition, so that its occupation is, and would be, of no value to any one, I should quite agree that it cannot be rated to the relief of the poor. But I must demur to the view that the question whether profit (by which I understand is meant pecuniary profit) can be derived from the occupation by the occupier is a criterion which determines whether the premises are rateable, and at what amount they should be assessed. . . . The possibility of making a pecuniary profit is not in my opinion the test whether the occupation is of value.

FRY, L.J.—Then we are told that there is a general practice in the case of railways which ought to govern this case; that this line has become an integral part of the lines of the three companies; and where that is the case the principle laid down in Reg. v. G. W. Ry. applies. I cannot see that there is any such general principle as alleged applicable to the present case. There has been, as it seems to me, no absorption of this line in the lines of the other companies. It remains for many purposes distinct and capable of being separately let to a possible tenant. The Court, in Reg. v. G. W. Ry., seems to have despaired of any satisfactory mode of applying the test given by the Act, and to have acted on the view that in that case the mode adopted was the only possible mode of determining the rent; but here a different mode of proceeding is open.

MELLOR, J.—The question we asked is, whether the fact that the railway in the parish of Llantrissant contributes additional traffic to the Great Western Railway is to cause it to be rated to something in addition to the profit which the railway itself earns. This question is decided in principle by the Haughley Case, and I abide by what I said in that case. I think it must be taken that the Lord Chief Justice, in the Haughley Case, did not quite adhere to the suggestion he threw out in the Cannock Case (L. & N. W. Railway Co. v. Cannock, supra). I do not believe there was any difference of opinion between us in the Haughley Case, and certainly what I expressed in that case I abide by in the present case, that the rateable value in each parish of a line of railway passing through several parishes must depend on the actual earnings of the part of the railway within the particular parish, deducting the actual expenses of that part.—p. 357.

CAIRNS, L.C.—I will add also this, that, inasmuch as a case which was decided in the Court of Queen's Bench, the case of Reg. v. Metropolitan District Railway, was much commented on at your lordship's bar, I cannot avoid saying that, having carefully considered that case, I am obliged to admit that the view I have offered to your lordships of this section [128 of the East London Railway Act] is inconsistent with the view taken in that case. It is true that that case proceeded upon the construction, not of this Act of Parliament, but of an Act of Parliament which contains words not precisely identical, but words which appear to me to be in substance the same; and I am bound to admit that the view which I certainly entertain of this clause, and which I ask your lordships to adopt, is a view which must supersede the view taken by the Court of Queen's Bench in that case.—p. 89.

It deals with railways as a whole, and apportiones the annual value according to the number of miles in each parish, not according to the annual value of the land occupied in each, nor according to the proportion of traffic in each, nor according to the profit on the amount received as compared with the expense of working in each. The actual value, positive or relative, of the part of the railway situated within each parish is excluded from the inquiry."

LORD CHELMSFORD.—The cases of Crease v. Sawle and Reg. v. Todd, cited in the argument, are not opposed to that decision (Lead Smelting Co. v. Richardson, supra). It was not held in either of these cases that the tin mine in the one case, or the lead mine in the other, was rateable, but that the lessors receiving by way of render a certain proportion of the ore in an unmanufactured state, were rateable to the relief of the poor in respect to the ore delivered to them.

COCKBURN, C.J.—That case (Rex v. Bilston) is not, to my mind, a satisfactory one, and seems contrary to general principles. The ground taken by Bayley, J. was that the engine in question was really part of the mine. On the other hand, it is said by Holroyd, J. that the engine was not profitable, but burthensome, except as it concerned the mine itself. The reasons of Littledale, J. are not given.

BLACKBURN, J.—There was an idea at one time arising from a dictum of Mr. Justice Bayley, in Rex v. Bilston, that, because a mine was not rateable, other things held and occupied along with it also were not rateable, going apparently on some notion, that they were either part of the mine, or that, the mine not being rateable, it was illegal to rate them when occupied in connection with that mine. I certainly understood in the case which has been cited of Guest v. East Dean, we distinctly said and held, and if not, I am prepared to hold now, that there was a mistake; and that where there was an exclusive occupation of land, although for the purpose of assisting to work a mine which is not rateable itself, that land was as much rateable as if it were occupied for the purpose of a canteen, or for the purpose of delivering water, either of which is not of itself rateable. Then in all those cases, the value of the thing is to be ascertained in the way which was the difficulty in the case of Guest v. East Dean, in which we principally considered how the quantum was to be got at.—p. 13.

BLACKBURN, J.—A different mode has been adopted in the anomalous case of saleable underwoods. Rex v. Mirfield was a case of that kind, and the Court held that though such underwoods be cut only once in twenty-one years, they were liable to be assessed every year. . . . That principle is quite exceptional, and in the present case [where the question was whether in assessing a cemetery company, plots of land sold by it during the year could be taken into account] it is much better to suppose that what was the annual value in one year would be a guide to the probable annual value in another year.

COCKBURN, C.J.—If we were dealing with a case in which the owner of the soil had reserved to himself, upon granting a lease of it, the right to take game as against the tenant, or if he had by a valid grant severed the right to take game, which is otherwise incident to the occupation of the soil, and conveyed it to some other person, and then after having divested the soil of that incident, let the land to a tenant subject to the right thus granted, Reg. v. Thurlstone would be an authority to show that the occupier is not liable to be rated in respect of the annual value which arises from the right to take game. If that point had now arisen for the first time, I confess I should have hesitated in coming to the conclusion which the Court arrived at in Reg. v. Thurlstone, though I agree that the case is one of great difficulty and nicety.—p. 12.

MELLOR, J. (for the Court).—Reg. v. Thurlstone, in which the value of game reserved was deducted from the rate of the occupier of the land, has been considered as of somewhat doubtful authority.—p. 78.

LINDLEY, J.—But it is said that it is not so, because, under similar circumstances, Reg. v. Battle, Sussex, the right of sporting was held not to be severed, but when we look at the authority the point does not seem to have been decided. The point there decided is that before this Act Mrs. Curling might have been rated. In the course of the argument the L.C.J. certainly describes the right of sporting as separated from the occupation, and in the judgment he appears to treat the right as severed, though not severed as in Reg. v. Thurlstone (supra). That case, Reg. v. Battle, Sussex, does not appear to me to be authority for holding that when the owner of the land demises the right of sporting by an irrevocable deed there is no severance.—p. 29.

MATHEW, L.J.—It was urged that the value to the New River Co. of the water passing into the channel should be taken into account. The intake, it was said, was analogous to the spring in Rex v. New River Co., and therefore the sum of 3,180l. might properly be treated as the annual value of the water passing over the intake from the river Lea. But the hypothetical tenant would have no right to interfere with the flow of water for any other purpose than that of measurement. The analogy of the spring wholly failed: for the owners of the spring would have no independent right to the water, and the value of the water to them would, therefore, be properly taken into account.

ESHER, M.R.—Then the second point consisted in likening this case to Reg. v. Christopherson, in which the rector of a parish received an income independently of tithes. In that case we held that it was very much the same thing as if a tenant was by other means a rich man; in such a case his riches derived alimunde would not be an advantage or a disadvantage to the business which he was carrying on: they would be no part of the business. Those riches would be a wholly independent thing. In the present case the very thing—the rate in aid—which is to prevent a loss in the carrying on of the appellants' business is an advantage to the business itself: it is an advantage to the land which they are using for the purpose of their business.

COCKBURN, C.J.—I agree with my brother, Blackburn, that the principle laid down in The Hackney and Lamberhurst Tithe Rent-Charges (supra, Goodchild v. St. John, Hackney), as to allowing a deduction in respect of the stipend of a curate ought not to be extended. Where the incumbent, not being in the position of a voluntary pluralist, is so circumstanced that his duties cannot be discharged by one man, then there is some reason for the exception to the general rule but only in such a case ought any part of the tithe rent charge to be withdrawn from local taxation.—p. 726.

MELLOR, J. (for the Court).—Although we might have thought that the Hackney Case had not been based upon a sound application of the true principles of the law of rating, we should have thought it unwise to depart from it after it had been followed in so many subsequent cases. Since then, however, the case of The Mersey Docks (35 L. J. M. C. 1; 11 H. L. Cas. 443) has been decided by the House of Lords, which, as it appears to us, has not only set us free from the authority of the Hackney Case but has in effect overruled it, by placing the law of rating property to the poor rate upon principles entirely inconsistent with it.—p. 509.

RIGBY, L.J.—In the case before NORTH, J. (Richards v. Kidderminster Overseers) it was held that sect. 16 applied; that there had been a change of occupation. We have nothing to do with that case at all. It is a case absolutely different from the present. It was a case in which on the terms of a deed—it may be similar to that which exists in this case; but the deed in this case has nothing to do with the point—but on the terms of a deed before him, and relying at any rate upon one particular part of that deed, the company were to remain in possession until a certain event, and upon that event possession was given up. He held perfectly rightly in that case that there was a change of occupation with the necessary result. True it is that in that case there are some words which seem to say that the case of a distress under these statutes falls within the same principle as the case of an execution. I do not know whether the matter was argued or not before North, J. It was not in the least necessary to hold anything of the kind, for as has been pointed out, there was an actual conveyance of the goods—an assignment of the goods—to other persons, and that was relied upon. At any rate if these words are treated as a considered judgment with reference to the position of overseers and their right to distrain under these Acts, we are constrained to say that, in our opinion, that cannot be supported.—p. 845.

CHANNELL, J. (for the Court).—That was an appeal under 17 Geo. 2, c. 38, s. 7; and it only decided that there could be no appeal under that section on grounds applicable to an appeal against the rate. The decision was not that no appeal lay under that section where the distress was in the place of assessment, and it does not seem to us that either judge thought that was so.

COTTON, L.J. (for the Court).—There the Divisional Court had given leave to appeal; there the Divisional Court was held to be exercising an original and not merely a consultative jurisdiction; and the facts of the case were held to bring it within sect. 19 (4) and not within sect. 45 of the Judicature Act. Can that be said to be the case here? We think not. In the present case the Q. B. D. was not exercising its well-known jurisdiction of supervising the orders of inferior Courts, but the case came before that Division as it were by accident; that is, the case could under sub-sect. 7 of sect. 269 of the Public Health Act, 1875, have been heard and decided in any of the Common Law Divisional Courts, so that this case was an appeal from an inferior Court within sect. 45 of the Judicature Act. It was therefore an appeal to the High Court; it has been determined in one of the Divisional Courts of the High Court, and the determination of such an appeal by such a Court is by the statute final, unless special leave to appeal is given. No such leave has been given in this case . . . and this appeal must on that ground be dismissed.—p. 523.

CHANNELL, J.—The real question is whether the decision of Darling, J. and myself in Reg. v. Kent JJ., was right. In the present case the rule was obtained before Darling, J. and myself, and I think that I have his authority, from what passed then, to say that he would concur in the view I am about to express. In Reg. v. Kent JJ., two points were decided. . . . The second point decided in that case was that in an appeal from a poor rate the service of proper notice was a condition precedent to the appeal being heard or entertained. The decision upon that point was given per incuriam. It was in fact a mistake. It arose from our attention not having been called to the fact that there is a difference in this respect between an appeal from a poor rate under the Act of Geo. II. [the Poor Relief Act, 1743] and other appeals, and that in the case of poor rates, by what Erle, J. called an established malpractice, the appeal must be respited, although the proper notices have not been given. We, by mistake, referred to Reg. v. Eyre [1857 ; 26 L. J. M. C. 125], which is not in point. By a curious coincidence Reg. v. Eyre is reported three times in the same volume, and we appear to have referred to the report at p. 125 of vol. 26 of the "Law Journal Reports" (Common Law), which had nothing to do with the case before us, although the reports at pp. 14 and 121 were relevant. Under these circumstances we are not bound by Reg. v. Kent JJ. Nor, in my opinion, would any other judges be bound to follow the decision in that case. It would be apparent to them that the three strong decisions in Shrewsbury Ry. v. Leominster Overseers (1857, 21 J. P. 149) ; Liverpool United Gas Co. v. Ervinton (1871 ; 40 L. J. M. C. 104 ; L. R. 6 C. P. 414) ; and Reg. v. Surrey JJ. (1880 ; 50 L. J. M. C. 10 ; 6 Q. B. D. 100), were not drawn to our attention, and I therefore think that they would hold themselves not bound by the decision ; and whether that is so or not, I think it clear that I am at liberty to say that I am not bound by it. That being so, the Recorder had, in my opinion, jurisdiction to entertain, and was bound to entertain the appeals, even if the proper notices were not given. No specific application was made to him to enter and respite the appeals, and in many cases that omission would be fatal and a ground for refusing a mandamus. But in the present case the application was unnecessary, as it had been expressly held in Reg. v. Kent JJ., that the appeals could not be entertained, and that an application to respite must be refused. It might be possible to distinguish Reg. v. Kent JJ., on the ground that it was a decision under sect. 52 of the Local Government Act, 1894, and that that section refers to a transfer under the Act and not under an order of the Local Government Board. But I prefer to hold that our decision upon the second point in that case was wrong, and that, therefore, the mandamus must go.—p. 343.

COLERIDGE, C.J.—But that case (Reg. v. Great Western Railway) has come under the consideration of two Courts subsequently, of one in June, 1871, and of the other in May, 1879, before the late Lord Chief Justice, and Lopes, J. In both these cases Reg. v. Great Western Railway was apparently brought to the attention of the Court, and the Court in both cases considered and dealt with that case, and, as it appears to me—I do not like to say overruled it, but—intimated a very grave doubt whether it was right. . . . I think the two later cases rightly pointed out the construction we are now putting on the enactment as the true one. It is enough if the rate is made in conformity with the list which exists, and the appellant, prior to appealing against the rate, has applied to the assessment committee, and not got the relief he deems just.—p. 455.

RIGBY, L.J.—Then it is said that in Reg. v. Denbighshire JJ., it was laid down that to go before the assessment committee once was a sufficient compliance with the statutory condition precedent which is found in sect. 1 [of the Union Assessment Committee Amendment Act, 1864]. Supposing that is so how does it affect this case? We should be holding in direct contradiction to what appears to be the fact if we were to hold that the conditions of sect. 2 had been complied with.

COCKBURN, C.J.—No doubt Sir William Erle in this case seems to have held, that where there was an appeal on the ground that several persons were under-rated, and some had had notice and some not, it was not competent to the appellant to abandon his appeal as to some and go on as to the others. It is difficult to understand or maintain such a proposition; and, with the greatest respect to Sir William Erle, I cannot assent to such a doctrine, I cannot but think that learned judge for once must have been wrong.—p. 136.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The defendant's claim is not for any relief arising out of or incidental to the relief sought to be obtained by the plaintiff in his action. In this respect the case differs from Sargant v. Read, which was an action for dissolution of a partnership and for taking the partnership accounts, and Sir G. Jessel there held that the defendant was entitled to give a cross notice of motion in the plaintiff's action for the appointment of a receiver. It differs also from Porter v. Lopes (infra), which was a partition action, and there the defendant was held entitled to move for a receiver for the protection of the property.

FRY, J.—Neate v. Pink was a very peculiar case, and its very peculiarity seems to me to indicate that there is no such general rule as has been insisted upon. There the suit was instituted by some persons who were entitled under the will of J. H., who was the owner of one moiety of a plantation in Jamaica; the other moiety belonged to two persons named F. and Y. Receivers and managers of the testator's estates had been appointed by the Court, proceedings were taken in the Court of Chancery in Jamaica to give effect to the proceedings in the suit in this country, and the receivers who had been appointed by the Court in this country were let into possession of the testator's moiety of the plantation, and took possession of the other moiety also. They made profits on their reception of both moieties, and therefore the fund which was in Court resulting from the working of the plantation represented, as to some portion of it, property which the receivers had no right whatever to receive, and in respect of which there was a perfectly good equitable claim on the part of the owners of that property to be repaid. The persons against whom they had that right were officers of the Court, who had in effect under the direction or acquiescence of the Court, entered on the property. They had, in another action, been found to be liable to F. and Y. in respect of the use and occupation of their moiety, and being so liable, they were entitled, under the circumstances, to an indemnity out of the fund in Court. The Court took a short course, and gave to the persons who had a right against the receivers a right against the fund out of which the receivers were entitled to an indemnity. That case was determined upon its very special circumstances . . . The very language in which the judgments of the Vice-Chancellor and the Lord Chancellor are couched indicates that there is no general principle giving to every person who is interested in having money paid to him by a receiver a right of access to the Court in the way contended for.—p. 844.

STIRLING, J.—Then there was also cited the remarkable case of Neate v. Pink . . . It seems to me, looking at the whole of the facts [see last extract], that the Court came to the conclusion that this leasehold interest in the moiety of the plantation must be treated as belonging to A. B.'s (the testator's) estate, and, once that conclusion is arrived at, there is no difficulty in applying the principle laid down in the Irish case (Bulfe v. Blake, 1 Ir. Ch. R. 365, 367) to which I have referred. It was a material circumstance in that case that the landlords had recovered judgment in Jamaica against the receivers for the rent which was due, so that the Jamaica Courts showed that they treated the relation of landlord and tenant as existing between the owners of that moiety of the property and the receivers. If that were so there would be clearly a right of indemnity to the receivers out of the estate, and the Court might well have applied that equity and paid the money directly out of the fund. But here again I think that the case is distinguishable because no claim has been made by the company against the receiver or any one else.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—In [that case in] 1811 an incumbent charged his benefice with an annuity and covenanted that if he should be preferred to any other benefice he would charge it with the annuity. . . . In 1814 the incumbent was preferred to another living. In 1817 charges on ecclesiastical benefices were prohibited by 57 Geo. 3, c. 99. No legal charge upon the new living had been executed before that Act passed. A question afterwards arose between the person entitled to the annuity and judgment creditors in possession under a sequestration. It was argued for the judgment creditors that as specific performance would be in contravention of the statute, the equitable title must fail. . . . But the L.C. was of opinion . . . that there was an equitable charge independently of the covenant to execute a legal charge. It was then said for the defendants that all equitable charges rest upon specific performance and the right to have a legal charge. Lord Cottenham, however, replied, "This is by no means so," and he affirmed the V.-C.'s judgment giving effect to the equitable charge.

JESSEL, M.R.—Lord Cottenham in Neate v. Marlborough (Duke) felt bound by the prior authorities, and decided that that useless and absurd form by which the creditor could not get the estate must be followed, and that the bill failed for not having alleged it. Still the substance of the case was that the judgment creditor had exercised his option to take the defendant's land, and that he could not get at it because the defendant's interest was of an equitable nature, which could not be reached except by the assistance of the Court of Equity; and when he showed that he had exercised his option, and was in the position of a man who would have got the land at law if the estate had been legal, he was entitled to the assistance of the Court of Equity by interlocutory application if the estate was equitable.—p. 836.

BAGGALLAY, L.J.—Anglo-Italian Bank v. Davies shows that the old process still exists; but the M.R. evidently thought that the exercise of the jurisdiction by motion was the preferable way, although, as it was not there necessary to decide it, he did not give judgment on that point.—p. 40.

LINDLEY, L.J.—The principle on which alone the order in this case could be supported before the Judicature Acts is well explained by Cotton, L.J. in Anglo-Italian Bank v. Davies; it is that Courts of Equity gave relief where a legal right existed and there were legal difficulties which prevented the enforcement of that right at law. But the existence of a legal right is essential to the exercise of this jurisdiction. The judgment creditor here has a legal right to be paid his debt, but not out of the future earnings of his debtor; and the Court of Chancery had no jurisdiction to prevent him from earning his living or from receiving his earnings, unless he had himself assigned or charged them.

V. WILLIAMS, L.J.—I believe the view so taken by James, L.J., to be the right mode of regarding equitable execution, and I do not think that it is really inconsistent with anything that was said in Shepherd, In re (infra, col. 2797) or Harris v. Beauchamp (infra, col. 2797) with regard to the circumstances under which and the procedure by which equitable execution can be obtained. It is quite plain, in my opinion, that James, L.J., regarded equitable execution as substantially a form of execution; execution which a Court of Equity enables a judgment creditor to obtain where legal execution is not available.

ESHER, M.R.—It is said that that section [s. 25 of the Judicature Act, 1873] gives the Court power to do what neither a Court of law nor a Court of Equity could have done before the Act; and Smith v. Cowell seems to show that to be so, but the condition is that it shall appear to the Court to be just or convenient that the order (for appointment of a receiver) should be made.

DAVEY, L.J. (for the Court).—But that case affords no warrant for saying that the equitable jurisdiction now possessed by all branches of the High Court, and exercisable in the action, differed from or exceeded the old equitable jurisdiction.

STIRLING, J.—The question of the remuneration of a receiver was discussed by Lord Langdale in Day v. Croft, where it is suggested that prima facie such remuneration should be 5 per cent. But I have made inquiry as to the present practice, and find that the rule mentioned by Lord Langdale no longer exists. A chief clerk of great experience has informed me that 3 per cent. is the common amount, or 5 per cent. in cases of difficulty; if there were a scale 3 per cent. would be nearer the amount than 5 per cent.; 10 per cent. has been allowed but only in very rare cases. Where there is a manager there is no scale, but each case is decided on its merits.—p. 761.

ALVERSTONE, M.R.—It was also urged that a receiver appointed by an order in lunacy stands in the same position as a receiver appointed by the Court of Chancery, and that it would be a contempt of Court for the plaintiff to pursue his claim, and Ames v. Birkenhead Dock Trustees was cited as showing that any interference with such a receiver without the leave of the Court would not be permitted. There the Court, at the suit of a mortgagee, had appointed a receiver of the rates and tolls and of the rents of the property of the defendants; and it was held that a judgment creditor of the defendants was not entitled, without the leave of the Court, to interfere with the receiver's collection of those tolls, and that such interference would be a contempt of Court, even though the order appointing him might be erroneous. In my opinion that decision has no application to an order appointing a receiver to get in the property of a lunatic. I think neither of the two orders in lunacy has any operation to deprive the plaintiff of any rights which he possessed [as vendor to a lien for unpaid purchase-money.]

BACON, C.J.—Sutton v. Rees is a case which does not hold out any encouragement to a landlord to be forbearing.—p. 98.

Mayhew, In re, Till, Ex parte (1873) 42 L. J. Bk. 84; L. R. 16 Eq. 97; 21 W. R. 574.—C.J., explained.

Mead, In re, Cochrane, Ex parte (1875) L. R. 20 Eq. 282; 44 L. J. Bk. 87; 23 W. R. 726.

BACON, C.J.—Ex parte Till decided simply this: A landlord, having by law a right to distrain for rent due to him, the bankruptcy law has curtailed that right only in one respect, by limiting the amount for which he can distrain to a year's rent. But for that the common law remains unchanged, and it remains as a law paramount, and the law relating to bankruptcy has plainly recognised that right, so that the landlord, whenever there is a bankruptcy, shall have a right to distrain, but shall not exercise that right for more than one year's rent. What has that to do with the appointment of a receiver? The receiver takes the whole of the bankrupt's property, but he takes it subject to the paramount right of the landlord to distrain for that amount. Ex parte Till carries it no further than that.—p. 288.

STIRLING, J.—But on what does that (the principle of the above cases) depend? It depends on the principle that the officer of the Court, being placed in the position of a tenant, is bound to do as a just and honest tenant would. How does that apply to this case? Here the position of the officer of the Court is not that of a tenant, but of a sub-tenant, and, as I have said, it is perfectly clear that a sub-tenant is entitled as between himself and the lessor to occupy upon the terms upon which the lessee has granted him the lease, and that he is not bound to pay or perform the covenants which are contained in the head-lease.

Lord Brougham, it is true, referred to a question said by him to be one of difficulty, which is not foreign to the present case; but he did so only for the purpose of saying that he would not express any opinion on it.—p. 160.

NAISH, L.J.—The fact . . . that in the present case there is immediately following the grant of the annuity a limitation taking effect under the Statute of Uses, of a term of 100 years, which has precedence of the ultimate limitation to the freeholder, establishes a distinction between this case and that of Thomas v. Sylvester, the effect of which we have to consider. Thomas v. Sylvester may be taken as establishing that if there were no term, and if the freehold reversioner were in possession in the pernaney of the rents and profits, an action of debt would lie against him. . . . But where there was an antecedent term, the freeholder . . . was so far from being regarded as an owner, that he was considered a mere stranger. . . . It is said, however, that here he is in possession—in the pernaney of rents and profits. I ask, however, in what capacity this possession and pernaney is enjoyed at law? Clearly as tenant at will, or, it may be, bailiff of the tennor; and if it be a possession under and not over, the term, I do not see how Thomas v. Sylvester rules the case. The possession there was of a different character from that here. The possession at law was that of the freeholder—here it is not. . . . I am therefore of opinion that the possession of the defendant here is wholly different from that of the defendant in Thomas v. Sylvester. In the latter case he had at law large and extensive rights, and, having these, was held liable to a personal action. Here there are no corresponding rights—a fact arising from a particular remedy and security, namely, a trust term having been created with the consent, or on the stipulation, it must be taken, of the jointress, for the purpose of protecting the jointure.—pp. 490, 491.

COTTON, L.J.—Undoubtedly an action for debt may be brought against the terretenant for a rent-charge. That was decided in Thomas v. Sylvester. It is not that there is any charge on them on account of their holding the land, but only that when the land is vested in any one he contracts a liability to pay the rent-charge while he holds the land.

STIRLING, J., after considering *Thomas v. PORTER, M.R.—Thomas v. Sylvester does ~~not~~ apply to this case. If there is anything plain it is that there was [here] no loan in the ordinary sense. . . . The rent-charge was not to be a security to the defendants for an advance. It was to be their own sole and absolute property. This is in substance a purchase of a rent-charge to be created in part by means of the purchase money to be paid for it.—p. 155.

FRY, L.J.—The only observation I would make with regard to Willoughby v. Willoughby, which was pressed upon us as an authority is that it does not appear to me to be inconsistent with the present decision. The Court there found an absence of any expression that the persons by whom the rents were to be paid were the persons against whom the remedies were to be directed, and upon that ground came to the conclusion that an action of debt would not lie against the defendant. But the words which were wanting there are present here, the reasoning in Willoughby v. Willoughby does not therefore apply.—p. 543.

PORTER, M.R.—The question then arises as to the applicability of the principle in Swift v. Kelly. Is he [the defendant, who was owner of an estate subject to outstanding mortgages], within the decision of Swift v. Kelly a "person of the profits" of the land on which the rent-charge is charged, and as such personally liable? . . . He is in possession; and in equity would be considered the owner of the estate, subject to the incumbrances; but his legal position is that he is a mere tenant at will, or a bailiff to the mortgages . . . It must be remembered that the only freehold estate in the lands was in the defendant in Swift v. Kelly, the outstanding estate being a term of years. And, therefore, I think the decision of the C. A. [in that case] applies to the present with fourfold force.—pp. 321, 322.

Odum v. Thompson (1893) 31 L. R. Ir. 394. CHATTERTON, V.-C.—Another case may be also referred to—Searle v. Cooke—which more nearly approaches the present. It was there held on the authority of Thomas v. Sylrester that the defendant was personally liable for the arrears of a rent-charge accrued during his occupancy of the land on which it was charged, and so far it is an authority for plaintiff . . . On appeal, Cotton, L.J. states that it was admitted that the tenant was in possession of all the land subject to the rent-charges, and that the rents were sufficient to pay the rent-charges. This must be taken as according with the view of Kay, J. (in the Court below), and as an opinion that the sufficiency of the rents was the ground for the personal claim being made for payment without an inquiry (as to the rents and profits).—p. 402.

COLLINS, J.—In Odum v. Thompson the V.-C. further relied on the analogy of an executor's position who has actually entered, and who is sued as assignee of the term, and who is nevertheless allowed to plead that the profits fall short of the rent, and to measure his liability accordingly. . . . But I cannot think that the exceptional position of an executor presents any analogy to that of a complete legal assignee like the defendant in this case.—p. 662.

COLERIDGE, J.—In Sells v. Hoare it is true that a rule was refused to disturb a verdict for a shilling damages, where the goods taken under a distress had not been sold in consequence of an arrangement between the parties; but there the action was for an excessive distress, and an excessive distress was proved, and there was, therefore, a good right of action; and it may well be, that the arrangement coming subsequently, the circumstances of which are not stated, may not have defeated the right of action, and the plaintiff only recovered a shilling. This, therefore, does not interfere with the general and well-known rule.—p. 127.

PARKE, J.—Alchorne v. Gomme is an authority the other way; but the pleadings in that case do not, perhaps, sufficiently raise the question now under consideration; and by the form of those pleadings the attention of the Court seems to have been principally directed to the consideration of the effect of the alleged attornment by the tenant to the mortgagee, which, in the view I have taken of the subject in this case, appears to me to be immaterial, the notice given by the mortgagee being sufficient to determine the authority of the mortgagor, and to entitle the mortgagee to receive, whether the tenant attorned or not.—p. 258.

COCKBURN, C.J.—No one disputes the proposition that you cannot distrain on close A. for rent due on close B. and vice versa; but if there be rent due on both, and no more taken upon each than is due in respect of each, then you may avow so as to set the matter right. In . . . Bedford v. Sutton Coldfield, there is a manifest distinction, because the aggregate rent-charge being charged in separate sums on the separate properties, the owner of the rent-charge had distrained on one for the whole. Rogers v. Birkmire is to the same effect.—p. 166.

A. L. SMITH, J.—Glasgow Water Commissioners v. Solicitor of Inland Revenue (supra, col. 2816) . . . is distinguishable. There the scheme of the local Act was that the corporation were never to make any profit at all. In this case the burial board are entitled to charge any fees they think proper, and in the course of their business they make a profit. When once you have the fact that a profit is made, it is taxable under the Income Tax Act, and since Mersey Docks v. Lucas it must be taken to be wholly immaterial what is the destination of such profit—whether it is appropriated to the benefit of one or more persons, or retained for the benefit of the person who makes it.—p. 14.

LORD HERSCHELL.—In the Q. B. D. the case was concluded by a previous decision of the same Court relating to a free library at Bristol—Andrews v. Bristol Corporation. In the C. A., Lindley and Rigby, L.JJ. were of opinion that the appellants were not entitled to the exemption claimed; the M.R. arrived at the contrary conclusion. The learned judges who formed the majority considered that the Corporation of Manchester, even in its character of library authority, could not properly be called a "literary institution." Lindley, L.J. was of opinion, further, that a library supported by rates could not be a literary institution within the meaning of the Income Tax Act.—p. 675.

SIR M. SMITH (for self, SIR B. PEACOCK, SIR R. COLLIER and SIR R. COUCH).—In Forder v. Handyside it was held that, under the provisions of the English Property and Income Tax Act, 5 & 6 Vict. c. 35, s. 100, Case 1, Rule 3 (1), a company carrying on the business of iron-founders could not deduct from the net profits of the year a sum of money which had been set aside, in accordance with the terms of its deed of association, as a reserve fund for the purpose of meeting the depreciation of buildings and machinery. It is clear that, under the English Act, losses connected with or arising out of any business during the year would form a deduction from the profits, and in the very case referred to the repairs of buildings and machinery were allowed, as being a proper deduction from the net profits. Their lordships are at a loss to see how this case lends any support to the judgment, unless, indeed, the assumption of the Chief Justice that the losses of the business are to be treated as a loss of capital, and not of income, were tenable.—p. 384.

LORD BLACKBURN.—In Forder v. Handyside the Ex. D. came to a conclusion as to repairs, estimated but not actually incurred, which, whether it was right or wrong, is no longer, since 41 Vict. c. 15, s. 12, to apply. And as there is no question in the case at bar as to repairs, it is unnecessary to inquire whether it was right or wrong.—p. 338.

GROVE, J.—In my view, the decision of the House of Lords in Coltress Iron Co. v. Black, which virtually overruled the decision in Knowles v. McAdam [supra], was to the effect that "profits" must be taken to mean that which the mine-owner in any given year puts in his pocket, or could, if he chose, put in his pocket, minus the expenditure. He cannot go back and take into account the profit and loss account for a series of previous years. . . . I think that the question here is, whether, when the mine has become a profitable concern, the lessees can deduct antecedent losses from the profits of their particular year in respect of which the tax is sought to be imposed. The House of Lords, in Coltress Iron Co. v. Black, have decided in principle that they cannot, and that case seems to me directly in point.* . . . The only distinction between this case and Coltress Iron Co. v. Black is, that there is a payment in advance under a bargain with the landlord, whilst in that case there were losses merely which the lessees had incurred by exhausting their capital. I do not think that distinction is material.—pp. 496, 498.

MELLOR, J.—What was there [Denby v. Moore] held was that when a tenant does not take the opportunity of deducting the [property] tax, but goes on without any claim to deduct paying the full rent for a series of years, and no arrangement is made with the landlord, then the right to deduct is gone, and the payments so made by the tenant in excess of the rent he was bound to pay are voluntary payments, and cannot be recovered back. In the present case the tenant claims to deduct at a time when he is entitled so to do, and by arrangement between himself and the landlord he abstains from insisting on such deduction, and the landlord promises to pay him afterwards. . . . It is obvious that such an arrangement is not within the scope of of the dicta of the judges in Denby v. Moore. The next case in which a similar question arose was Stubbs v. Parsons. Holroyd, J., there says: "The occupier has, as it seems to me, a lien on the next rent given him by the Legislature for the land tax paid by him; but if he parts with the rent without making the deduction he loses his lien, and has only his remedy by action or set-off." It seems clear from these observations that, if this is the correct principle, a contract between the tenant and the landlord, that if the tenant gives up his lien the landlord will subsequently repay the amount, is a contract for a perfectly valid consideration.—p. 222.

FIELD, J.—I am at a loss to discover, notwithstanding those expressions [Denby v. Moore] what fraud on the revenue there can be in such an agreement as this. At the time when that case was decided much looser ideas prevailed as to supposed frauds on statutes than at the present time. Now such notions are brought much more closely to the text of the positive language used in the statutes.—p. 223.

LORD BLACKBURN.—In Rex v. Cook the general principle as to the constitution of statutes imposing charges as containing an exemption of the Crown was laid down. That was a case raising the question whether the duty on post-horses was exigible in respect of post-horses carrying an express from the Governor of Portsmouth to one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, which was not on any private business whatever, but wholly related to the public concerns of this kingdom. It was held that it was not exigible (p. 65). . . . There [Clerk v. Dumfries Commissioners of Supply] the question was whether the commissioners of supply were chargeable with income tax in respect of police stations erected under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 72. If there be any difference between such police stations in Scotland erected by commissioners of supply, and those erected by the county authorities in England, it has not been pointed out, and I have not discovered it. The decision was that they were chargeable; and it certainly seems to me that the decision in the case at bar, at least so far as regards the police stations, and that Scotch decision, cannot both be right. It must be for your lordships to determine which you will follow. . . . I have great respect for the opinion of the Lord President, and he having said (though without giving his reasons) that in his opinion the poor-rate cases are not applicable, I have reconsidered the reasons which make me think them in point: and I have been unable to change my opinion. It seems to me that it is not material whether the assessment statute imposing any tax does so, like the Poor-rate Acts, for a local purpose, or like the statute imposing a duty on post-horses, considered in Ree v. Codd, or the income-tax, for an imperial purpose. In each case there is an implied exemption on the ground of prerogative.—pp. 70-71.

LORD DAVEY.—The business of the appellant company is not, on the facts stated in the case, entirely or exclusively carried on abroad, and therefore Colquhoun v. Brooks, on which the appellants' counsel relied, is no sufficient authority for the proposition which they maintained. . . . In my opinion, therefore, the case is outside both the decision and the reasoning of the noble and learned lords who gave judgment in Colquhoun v. Brooks, because I find that every one of those noble and learned lords confined their observations to a case in which the business was entirely carried on abroad.—p. 165.

CLEASBY, D.—Mr. Matthews treated Sully v. Att.-Gen. as if it had decided that where a person living in England carried on business as partner of a firm whose chief place of business was in America, the firm did not "reside" in England; but, in fact, the case did not decide that. The decision that the defendant was exempt was on the ground that no business was carried on in England within the meaning of the schedule. That case has, therefore, no bearing, because, in the present case, the bank does carry on business in England.—p. 8.

LORD DAVEY (for self, HALSBURY, L.C., LORDS MACNAGHTEN, ROBERTSON and LINDLEY).—The fallacy of the judgment of the Supreme Court in this and in Tindal's Case is in leaving out of sight the initial stages, and fastening their attention exclusively on the final stage in the production of the income. . . . The language used in the English judgments must of course, be understood with reference to the cases then under consideration. In Sully v. At.-Gen. (supra, col. 2826) and in Grainger v. Gough the question was whether the person sought to be charged was exercising a trade in this country within the meaning of the Acts. In the former case it was decided that the mere purchase of goods in this country for the purpose of enabling a person to trade in America did not constitute the exercise of a trade here; while in Grainger v. Gough it was held on the facts there found, that the sale by a French firm in France to English customers did not constitute the exercise of a trade in England. In such cases the place where the profits come home to the trader may be a very good test of the place where the trade is carried on. But these cases do not appear to their lordships to have much to do with a case such as the one before them, where a business is admittedly carried on in this country.—p. 89.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—I quite agree with what my brother Hawkins said in Watney v. Musgrave (supra, col. 2830). He says: "Here there are two distinct things, the trade of brewer and the public-house, and the expense incurred in respect of the latter cannot be deducted from the profit of the former." When a brewer is making up his balance of profits and gains he places to credit on the one side the beer and other articles and commodities which he has sold and obtained money for; on the other side he places to debit the necessary outgoings for earning that money, and the difference between the two would be, as Lord Herschell pointed out in the House of Lords in Russell v. Town and County Bank, the balance of gains and profits on which he would have to pay income tax. What the company are now suggesting they can do is this: That, inasmuch as they foster and keep up the independent trade of the publican, their tenant (and of course the better his trade is kept up the more beer will he probably buy from the brewers, his landlords), the cost of repairing his house is to be a deduction from the gains of the brewers. I am clearly of opinion that that argument is ill-founded and cannot prevail.—p. 30. RIGBY and COLLINS, L.JJ. concurred.

LORD MACNAGHTEN (for self, LORDS DAVEY, ROBERTSON, LINDLEY and SIR F. NORTH).—Their lordships may observe that Russell v. Town and County Bank, on which Owen, J. relied, has little or no bearing on the question. It merely decided that banking premises used by a bank for the purposes of its business were not used as a "dwelling-house" within the meaning of one of the Rules under Sched. D., although an official of the bank was required to reside there.—p. 427.

HALSBURY, L.C.—The C. A. seem to have been impressed by the decision in Alexandria Water Co. v. Musgrave. With the decision in that case I am not disposed to agree, though I am not quite certain I am able to adopt the reasoning, which, to some extent, appears to depend upon a distinction between the words "gains" and "profits"—a distinction which I cannot assent to; but, upon the facts, I think I should have come to the same conclusion, since, to put it very plainly, in that case it was a claim to deduct the company's debts for borrowed capital and diminish the amount of the profits of the trading.—p. 44.

LORD WATSON.—An annuity to the widow of a deceased partner, interest on capital advanced by a partner, or upon money borrowed for the purposes of the business, are truly payable out of profits earned, and therefore ought not to be deducted in estimating the income yielded by the business. On that ground I agree with the decision in Alexandria Water Co. v. Musgrave, although I am unable to concur in all the reasons which were assigned for it. But the business of the appellants consists in employing their trading capital to pay annuities, as the counterpart of the consideration given by the annuitant, and the annuities are payable out of stock, and not out of business profits.—p. 46.

LORD HERSCHELL.—The payments of interest to the debenture-holders [Alexandria Waterworks Co. v. Musgrave] were made out of the profits. These were ascertained by deducting from the moneys earned the expenses incurred in earning them; and of these expenses the payments to the debenture-holders formed no part. A portion of the capital was raised by shares, and another portion by debentures. There was no more reason why interest on the debenture capital should be deducted from the profits, than interest on the share capital. . . . It is by no means clear that the case was not within the prohibition of the 3rd rule [Income Tax Act, 1842, s. 100, Sched. D.]. Although it does not appear to me that the view of the present case which I have placed before your lordships is inconsistent with the decision in Alexandria Waterworks Co. v. Musgrave, I think it is in conflict with Mersey Loan Co. v. Wootton; but the reasoning which has led me to my present conclusion applies equally to the facts of that case.—p. 49. LORDS MORRIS and FIELD concurred.

HALL, V.-C.—I find in this case very much the same language as was used in Lovat (Lord) v. Leeds (Duchess), and there Kindersley, V.-C., was of opinion that there was no difficulty in speaking of income-tax as a tax "affecting the hereditaments," that it literally fell within those words, giving to them their technical and proper construction. To my mind, it is perfectly plain that the trustees deducting income-tax from the annuities, as they have in fact done, have thereby rendered them to the plaintiff, not as clear yearly sums "free from all deductions . . . whatsoever" according to the language of the will.—p. 110.

LORD BRAMPTON.—In *Grant v. HUDDLESTON, B.—With regard to the cases referred to as having been decided by the judges in Serjeants' Inn, I have no doubt that the records existing in the Inland Revenue Office have been accurately drawn up; but I protest against its being supposed that those cases are binding on us as decisions. The reasons for the decisions are not given, the records have not the guarantee of a reporter known to the public, and they are never laid before the public so as to be discussed, and to enable any mistakes which there may be in the reports to be detected.—p. 156.

POLLOCK, B.—In that case (Needham v. Bowers) the Court held that the institution, being wholly self-supporting, was not exempt as a hospital within the meaning of the exemption with which we are now dealing. We have no occasion whatever to quarrel with that decision, nor can we say that it governs the decision in the present case, because the whole force of that decision is that the hospital was supported wholly out of payments made by patients, which is very different from the facts in the present case. . . . It may be that for a few years a hospital may flourish by reason of taking those fees; it may be that a few years hence those fees will be less; the important point to consider is that the original eleemosynary character of the institution is not blotted out, but still exists. That is the distinction which arises between this case and the Charterhouse Case.—p. 590.

CHARLES, J.—The character of this institution differs from the character of the institution which was under consideration in Needham v. Bowers, in this respect, that whereas in Needham v. Bowers the institution was maintained wholly out of the payment by patients, and had no charitable endowment whatever, in this case there is a charitable endowment which amounts to many hundreds a year.—p. 592.

LINDLEY, J.—Reliance has been placed on the judgment in Yewens v. Noakes, but I do not think it is any authority against the exemption which is now claimed. I am not prepared to say what my decision would be if the opinions of the commissioners were not before me, but I think the facts are wholly different from those in Yewens v. Noakes. There the clerk lived in the house with his wife, children, and servant, and Thesiger, L.J., says, "The present is not upon the facts stated to us by the commissioners, the case of an ordinary caretaker, but of a man who occupies with his wife and family a considerable portion of the sitting-rooms and bedrooms of the dwelling, and occupies them not merely with his wife and family, but with a servant, for the purpose of attending upon him and his family." Further on the L.J. says that there is another ground for allowing the appeal that the legislature, in using the term servant, uses it in its ordinary and popular sense as a menial or domestic servant. But this opinion is extra-judicial, and he further says that, with reference to the difficulty there must be of drawing the line between cases under the Act, the commissioners must decide the point, and if they had found as a fact that the caretaker was a servant the Court would not be justified in interfering.—p. 675. And see post, col. 2841.

HERSCHELL, L.C.—In that case [Chelsea Waterworks v. Bowley] it was decided, upon the terms of the particular statute relating to the waterworks then in question, that the water company, in respect of their right to lay pipes for the purpose of carrying a stream of water through certain lands, had no interest in the lands, but had only an easement over them. It is quite unnecessary to inquire whether, upon the true construction of the Waterworks Act in relation to the facts of that case, a correct conclusion was arrived at in determining that the water company possessed an easement only. It is certainly a little difficult to reconcile some of the expressions used in that case with those used in Reg. v. East London Waterworks Co. I do not propose to enter upon any further discussion of those cases, because the ratio decidendi in Chelsea Waterworks v. Bowley was distinctly this, whether right or wrong, that the water company had no greater rights than those which are possessed by a person entitled to an easement, and that they had no interest in the land. If in the present case the right of the railway company was an easement only, I should be quite ready to follow the decision in Chelsea Waterworks v. Bowley, and to hold that that easement could not be made subject to the payment of land tax. But . . . the railway company have not merely an easement . . . they are the owners of a hereditament.—p. 555. LORD ASHBORNE to the same effect.

KEKEWICH, J.—What is the meaning of enabling the company to “appropriate and use the subsoil and under-surface”? The definition of the word “appropriate” is to be found in Metropolitan Ry. v. Fowler, towards the end of the speech of the L.C., and also in the speech of Lord Watson, who says: “To appropriate, according to its natural meaning, is to take and keep a thing by exclusive right; and, as I construe their Act, the authority which it confers upon the company is, to take and exclusively possess as much of the subsoil below highways as may be required for the purposes of the undertaking.” While dealing with that case, I may add that the H. L. held, as a natural consequence, that what the company had taken was “land.” . . . However, translating the word “appropriate” in the way that Lord Watson translates it, it really comes to the same thing as purchase—taking the subsoil for the company’s exclusive possession; that is to say, excluding all others and making it their own.—p. 532.

WILLS, J.—The view that the exemption [from land tax] is confined to lands belonging to the hospitals at the date when the Act making the tax perpetual was passed was taken by the Court of Ex. Rabbits*, where it was decided that the land exempt in 1693 as then being the site of a hospital preserved its exemption after its sale by the hospital.—p. 126.

Simpkin v. Robinson (1881) 45 L. T. 221.—POLLOCK, B. and HAWKINS, J.
POLLOCK, B.—It seems to me to be sufficient for the actual decision of the present case to say that it is brought within the decision in Patchett v. Bancroft . . . , in which it was held, in an action of trespass for taking the plaintiff's cattle and which was tried at York, that the person whose cattle were taken could not, if the distress-warrant was regular, and the conduct of the officers who executed the warrant was right, go behind the warrant, because, the power of distress being legal, those who executed the warrant were entitled to execute it, and justified in so doing. It was further held too, in that case, that the judgment of the Commissioners of Land Tax, on appeal to them, is conclusive in an action of trespass brought against an officer for levying under a warrant of distress. It is to be observed that in that case the Court treated the proceedings as a judgment by the Commissioners of Land Tax, and it may be well also to observe, in passing, that in . . . Holborn Land Tax Assessment, In re (post), on an application being made to the Ct. of Ex. for an order or mandamus to the Commissioners of Land Tax to cause the proper charge on a particular division to be equally assessed, that Court held, after a very long argument and great consideration, that they had no power to interfere, and upon this ground, namely, that the Commissioners of Land Tax were the constituted authority who had under the statute to deal with the matter in question, and that their authority was like the authority of any other Court and could not be appealed against, except under the provisions of some statute which had so provided.—p. 224.

BAILEY, J.—This construction of the Act is in conformity with Yeo v. Leman and Hyde v. Hill ; for, although improvements were there made after the leases had been granted, and the land tax was on that ground raised, they establish this principle—that of the land tax imposed on any premises, the landlord is to bear a part only in proportion to the rent that he receives.—p. 649.

PARKE, J.—None of the cases cited at the Bar are precisely in point, except the nisi prius case of Whitfield v. Brandwood (post), but as the noble and learned lord who decided that case has since inclined to a different opinion, on the first impression of the present case, and as the point in the case cited was not afterwards fully discussed before the Court, I do not rely upon that as a decisive authority. The dicta, however, of Lord Kenyon and Buller, J. in Hyde v. Hill, are in favour of this construction of the Act of Parliament, and that construction is so consistent with reason and justice that it ought to be adopted. The result is, that the lessor is bound to pay such proportion only of the land tax as the reserved rent bears to the total annual value.—p. 653.

BOVILL, C.J.—The question afterwards arose in the Ct. of Ex. in Att.-Gen. v. Brunning, as to the effect of a contract by a deceased person to sell real estate, and where the Crown sought to enforce its claim to probate duty on the purchase money. The Ct. of Ex. concurred with the view of Lord Langdale in Matson v. Swift (8 Beav. 368, see post, col. 2850), and held that probate duty was not payable, and although their judgment was reversed on appeal, the opinions expressed in the House of Lords on the reversal did not interfere with the doctrine for which I now cite the case. The ground on which the decision was overruled was, that the testator had sold his land by a binding contract, which contract was in fact carried out, and the purchase-money actually paid over to the executor, who was entitled to receive and did receive it as executor, and under the probate as part of the personal estate of the deceased.—p. 108.

ESHER, M.R.—In Att.-Gen. v. Dimond the testator was a creditor of the French Government for 32,727 francs of Rentes at five per cent. These were only payable by the French Government, the debtor in France, and payment could only be obtained by some act done in France. It was for that reason held that the debt, the asset, was not such an asset as was liable to pay probate duty in England.—p. 285.

ESHER, M.R.—In Att.-Gen. v. Hope, in 1834, it was held in the H. L. that goods in America at the date of the death of the testator, sent there by the testator for sale by his agents, and debts, both simple and contract debts, due to him in America, and money in American funds, were not liable to probate duty here, although all would eventually come to the hands of the executors here. . . . In Att.-Gen. v. Bouwens (post) Dutch bonds due to the testator were held liable, but it was because they were payable in England.—p. 285.

COLLINS, J.—I think the case is concluded by Lord Advocate v. Bogie. It seems to me the result of Lord Herschell's opinion is that it is not competent for any private person to turn property coming into existence after the death of an individual into a part of his personal estate at the time he died. It is competent for the Legislature to do so, and it has done so in the case of the children or other issue of the testator. That is the difference between this case and Perry's Executors v. Reg.—p. 279. WRIGHT, J. to the same effect.

Nunn's Estate, In re (1893) [1894] 1 Ir. R. 252.

MONROE, J.—The meaning to be attached to the words "the person acting in the administration of such estate and effects" was elaborately argued in Att.-Gen. v. Smith. There executors had certain pictures valued for the purpose of probate. They duly filed their affidavit, paying duty on the amount of the valuation, and distributing the estate according to their duty. It was afterwards discovered that the pictures were worth much more than the amount of the valuation, though the executors acted with perfect bona fides; and the Commissioners of Inland Revenue sought to compel them to bring in a further affidavit, and pay the additional duty. The Court, however, held that once the administration of the assets had been completed the executors were no longer "persons acting in the administration of the estate and effects," and if there was no person acting in the administration, the Inland Revenue could not be called upon to repay any sums they might have received in excess, nor could they, if too little duty had been paid, recover the amount unpaid from the executors. The duty was, in such case, lost, and the Crown was without remedy.—p. 257.

A. L. SMITH, L.J.—The point in Clitheroe Estate, In re [(1885) 55 L. J. Ch. 107; 31 Ch. D. 135.—C.A. see "SETTLED LAND," post, col. 3081] was whether the trustees of a term created by the will of the late Duke of Buccleuch were entitled to effectually exercise the powers of sale contained in the will without the consent of Lord Henry Scott, who was tenant for life of the settled estates, and it was held that they could not do so, for by the Settled Land Act of 1882, his consent was necessary; but it appears to me that this was no decision upon a taxing Act, nor in my opinion do the provisions of the Settled Land Act, which undoubtedly gives largely extended powers to a tenant for life, really affect the question now in hand. That Act was passed ad hoc intuitu, and not for the purpose of affecting a taxing Act. The Crown sought to rely upon Shirley v. Ferrers (Earl), in which Lord Lyndhurst, when L.C., held that sums to be annually applied by trustees of a term of 500 years out of the rents and profits of an estate towards the maintenance of a minor were not chargeable with legacy duty, he holding that for legacy duty to become payable under the Act (which was an Act for this purpose the same as the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 76, s. 4) there must be that which is a charge upon the estate of another, or in other words a person is not to pay legacy duty upon coming into the enjoyment of an estate which is his own. Lord Lyndhurst in that case held that the allowance payable to Caroline Shirley was payable to her for maintenance, to which in any event she was entitled, and consequently it could not be said that the allowance did not come out of her own estate; and this is where I think the present case differs from that. Nor does the case cited by the respondents of Strangways, In re, Hickley v. Strangways [(1886) 56 L. J. Ch. 195; 34 Ch. D. 423.—C.A. See "SETTLED LAND," post, col. 3082], apply to this case, for there by the terms of the will the tenant for life took no estate or interest in possession until the termination of the term thereby created.—p. 534.

Lawson v. Inland Revenue Commissioners (1895) [1896] 2 Ir. R. 418.—EX. D.

PALLES, C.B.—The property in question here is so situate as not to be subject to probate duty; and in that sense is, and for the purposes of this case I treat it as being, "situate out of the United Kingdom," although, in a sense, it has no situs of its own. But if, before the [Finance] Act [1894], legacy duty was payable in respect of it, estate duty is now payable. Thus the question is, would legacy duty have been payable before the Act upon these mortgages of foreign property? I was surprised to hear it stated that, to the present, there had not been any decision upon this question. This seems extraordinary, considering the large number of mortgages of foreign railways which are held by persons domiciled in London. If the debts secured by the mortgages were not charged upon real estate, admittedly they would have been liable to legacy duty. The basis of the decision of the H.L. in Thomson v. Advocate-General is contained in the following sentence of the opinion of the Judges, as delivered by Tindal, C.J.: "We cannot consider that any distinction can be properly made between debts due to a testator from persons resident in the country in which the testator is domiciled at the time of his death, and debts due to him from debtors resident in another and a different country; but that all such debts do equally form part of the personal property of the testator or intestate, and must all follow the same rule, namely, the law of the domicile of the testator or intestate."—p. 434.

Att.-Gen. v. Wood (1828) 2 Y. & J. 290.—EX.
 ALEXANDER, C.B.—Against Att.-Gen. v. Manners (supra) has been cited a case at a subsequent period, determined by Lord Eldon, for whose decisions I have certainly the utmost respect, knowing, as I do, how very much they were considered, and upon what a sound knowledge of the law all those decisions are founded. It is not the case itself that can be justly cited against that former decision, for that comes under circumstances so strikingly different, that it affords a marked distinction, and shows it did not come within the spirit of this Act of Parliament, but the language found in the report of the case by Mr. Price, in which Lord Eldon says, that appropriation means payment. Now, if I were disposed to give the utmost effect to these words, to the utmost extent that the counsel for the defendant could desire, I should not think myself at liberty to consider that which is but an obiter dictum, and not necessary to the decision of that case, an authority sufficient to overrule that which was actually done by this Court, upon great consideration. But I do not think, even giving full effect to those words, that such a consequence should follow. All that the L.C. says is, that a transfer by an executor to himself as trustee is an appropriation of the legacy.

It has been so held for a considerable length of time. For particular purposes unquestionably, it is an appropriation. If an executor transfer into his own name as trustee, the amount of a particular legacy, and act upon that transfer, that is an appropriation as against many persons, and in particular as against himself. But the question here is, whether that Act so done is to be considered as a delivery of the legacy as against the revenue, and this Act of Parliament; whether it is a retainer, or a satisfaction, or a discharge.—p. 301.

MALINS, V.-C.—It is settled by Haynes v.
Haynes that when a testator gives a clear annuity that is to be construed as an annuity free from duty, and in this case the testator has, in effect, given a clear yearly sum of 100l.
 to this charity. In Banks v. Braithwaite there was a direction to retain so much stock as should be sufficient to realize the clear yearly income of 150l., and to pay, not an annuity, but the dividends of the stock. Here the direction is to pay such income or yearly sum, that is to say, the clear income or yearly sum of 100l. Whether Banks v. Braithwaite is consistent with Haynes
v. Haynes, it is unnecessary for me to consider;
 I am bound to follow the latter, which is the decision of the C. A., and in the good sense of which, moreover, I entirely concur. I think that decision governs the present case, and I am, therefore, of opinion that this legacy was given free of duty.—p. 271.

LINDLEY, M.R.—I am not going through the authorities, but with reference to Banks v.
Braithwaite, I must say that I should not have construed the document there in question as Kindersley, V.-C. did. There a testator gave the residue of his personal estate to trustees upon trust to set apart 10,000l. Consols, and pay the dividends to his sister for life, and after her decease to retain so much of the said sum as should be sufficient to realise the clear yearly income of 150l.; and he directed the trustees to pay the dividends and other income of the stock so directed to be retained by them to his nephew.
 I should have read that as a gift of a clear yearly income of 150l. to the nephew. However, I see the difference between that case and this, because there was a difficulty in working out the principle which I should have endeavoured to apply with regard to certain rates of duties.
 Here we are not embarrassed by that at all.
 This is a simple appointment to E. Saunders of this sum. It appears to me that on the true construction of this document, the case of Banks v.
Braithwaite and others like it do not apply.—
 p. 56.

CHITTY, L.J.—With regard to legacies, the authorities have settled that where a legacy is given to one person so that only one rate of duty is payable, and the legacy given is a clear sum of money, the legatee takes free of duty. It is sufficient to refer to Haynes v. Haynes for that proposition. . . . It might be said that the word "clear," or the word "net," in this instrument refers to those expenses only [i.e., expenses of administration]. I think that would be a very narrow construction. That was not the construction which was adopted by Kay, J. in Currie, In re, where he had to deal with an appointment under a general power of so much of the trust funds as should be of the clear value of 1,000*l.*, and he held, and I agree with his reasoning, that that was an appointment of a sum of 1,000*l.* clear of all the trustees' expenses, and clear also of the legacy or succession duty. . . . The case is not the same as that by which Stirling, J. considered himself bound—Banks v. Braithwaite. . . . I must confess that I myself should on the construction of the will there have arrived at a different conclusion from that which the V.-C. arrived at. . . . I understand the reasoning of the V.-C., but I think it is too fine, if I may say so, to make it applicable to that case. . . . I think that the case is not governed by Banks v. Braithwaite, whatever may be said of that case. —pp. 57, 58.

WICKENS, V.-C.—The Succession Duty Act has in some cases received an interpretation . . . which seems not very consistent with the old canons of construction as applied to statutes laying burthens on the subject. But I am not at liberty to dissent from a decision of the Ct. of Ex., upon the ground of my not being able personally to agree with it. Of course, if I found that the case had been insufficiently argued before the Ct. of Ex., that might have enabled me to feel more free than I do. But in Att.-Gen. v. Gell, all the arguments which have been adduced before me in this case, and which arguments, if it were res integra, I should have thought were unanswerable, were brought before the Ct. of Ex. very fully and very ably; and it is clear that they were . . . carefully considered by the Court. Again, I might feel myself more free if it appeared that to follow the decision of Att.-Gen. v. Gell in this case, would be to give to the principle that the Ct. of Ex. laid down there, an extension that they never contemplated. But it appears that this particular application, or one which was an à fortiori one, was contemplated, and that they were willing not to disavow it.—p. 537.

HATHERLEY, L.C.—The difference between Thomson v. Advocate-General ((1845) 12 Cl. & F. 11.—H.L., ante, col. 2857) and this case is perfectly plain and manifest. The difference is exactly the same between this case and . . . Wallace v. Att.-Gen. In each of those cases you had to deal with a fund which was to be administered, and which was in the course of administration, before the person in whom the duty of administering it was imposed had cleared himself and discharged himself of that duty. In those cases, he being a foreigner (we must take him to be a foreigner, because the original owner of the property was a foreigner) you could not claim duties leviable under English Acts of Parliament from that person when you would have to pursue him before a foreign tribunal. But when the duties which have been imposed upon him involve the placing of the money here in funds within the functions of the judicature of this country, and when you find those funds in a state involving succession from one individual to another, then the duty has accrued, and you proceed to levy it.—p. 613.

ROMILLY, M.R.—Att.-Gen. v. Campbell was heard ex parte, no one appearing for the respondent, and though the point on which I mainly relied was only slightly alluded to by one of the counsel in the argument before the H. L. and was not noticed in their Lordships' judgment, yet the judgment they did pronounce does appear exactly to apply to the case now before me.—p. 200. [His lordship then discussed Wallace v. Att.-Gen. and Thomson v. Advocate-General and continued:] As, however, the decision of the H. L. in Att.-Gen. v. Campbell was unqualified and decisive, and as it clearly appears to me to govern every case of a settlement made in English form and, consequently to govern the case before me, I have no option but to follow it, and accordingly I shall make an order to the effect that the Court being of opinion that, according to the decision in Att.-Gen. v. Campbell, succession duty is payable in this case, order the same to be paid, and order the residue of the fund to be paid to the petitioner.—p. 204.
